as "a Communist organization", which is what this statute requires. Moreover broadcasting is permeated with a public interest,[66] and surely the people are entitled to know when an organization which falls within the definition of a Communist-action organization in this statute is addressing them over the air. All political parties identify themselves on the air; otherwise their appeals are useless. The only conceivable reason for anonymity of political broadcasting is a purpose of deception, and that purpose is enough to validate a requirement of identification.

All publications relating to candidates for elective office in the Federal Government must be identified, showing the names of the persons, associations, committees and corporations responsible for the publication or distribution, under heavy penalties for failure to do so.[67] Newspapers must plainly mark as "Advertisement" all editorial or other reading matter for which a consideration is received.[68] All agents of foreign governments must identify "political propaganda" sent through the mails.[69] It is difficult for us to perceive much substance in the claim that the provisions for the identification of the mail and broadcasts of an organization finally required to register under this Act are invalid. First principles protect the right of the public to be advised of the identity of an organization found to be promoting the objectives of the world Communist movement, as that movement is here defined.

The provisions respecting aliens, which were in Sections 22 and 25 of the statute before us, have been carried forward into the 1952 Immigration and Nationality Act.[70] Under the latter provisions sanctions apply to aliens who are members of organizations registered under the Act now before us. We therefore consider them. That membership in the Communist Party is a valid ground for the deportation of an alien is settled by Galvan v. Press,[71] and that it is a valid ground for denial of bail to an alien pending deportation proceedings is settled by Carlson v. Landon.[72] There is nothing on the subject to be added to the opinions in those cases. They rest upon the power of Congress over the admission of aliens and the rights of aliens to remain in this country.[73] The rationale upon which the Supreme Court there validated the proscription of alien members of the Communist Party applies directly to members of any Communist-action organization as defined in this statute. We think those rulings govern exclusion and naturalization as well as deportation and bail.

Section 25 of the statute before us[74] also contained a provision respecting denaturalization, which was carried forward as Section 340(c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of June 27, 1954.[75] It established as prima facie evidence[76] in a denaturalization proceeding proof that the person within five years of naturalization became a member of, among others, a registered Communist-action organization. The necessities of proof in a denaturalization case involving foreign allegiance are spelled out in Knauer v. United States.[11] A denaturalization does not flow automatically from registration; a regular proceeding for the purpose must be brought. No such case is before us, and we therefore express no views upon the problem. Its solution must await a specific test.

The sanctions with reference to tax exemptions and deductions, which are in Section 11 of the Act, forbid income tax deductions for contributions to a registered organization and deny income tax exemptions to such organizations. These allowances and denials fall within the field of congressional grace so long as a reasonable basis appears. This is too well established to require citation. We think these provisions clearly valid.

Concluding, then, our discussions of the several provisions applicable to registration and to registered organizations and their members, we find that they are reasonably related to a remedy for the evil depicted in this statute, that the impingement upon First Amendment rights which they effect is not beyond that permissible for the statutory purpose, and that the provisions are not violative of Fifth Amendment rights.

VII

The Party makes a number of additional attacks upon the statute as a whole. It says it is an "outlawry" statute. But many valid statutes declare specified activities to be unlawful. The critical questions concerning a so-called "outlawry" statute are whether the matter prohibited is eligible for prohibition and whether the procedures provided protect the rights of those involved. We have discussed those features of this statute.

The fact, if it be a fact, that no organization could survive registration under the Act is no detriment to the validity of the statute. In the first place, if an organization is actually operating primarily to achieve the objectives of a foreign organization dedicated to the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship in this country by other than constitutional processes, we perceive no constitutional obstacle to its outlawry. In the second place the inability of an organization to survive registration under this Act arises, if it does arise, not from the terms of the statute but because of the extreme unpopularity of the revealed foreign domination, of world dictatorship, and of the Communist world leadership. This statute does not forbid any person to be a member of the Party, but the Party says that when its members are identified their livelihood and liberty will be jeopardized. But a statutory requirement is not invalid merely because of results which may flow from the unpopularity of the cause affected. Popularity of men and movements varies with time and place. In some periods of our history friendship with Great Britain was unpopular, and at other periods friendship with Russia was popular. It would indeed be senseless to propose that popular causes could be subjected to statutory restrictions but that unpopular ones could not be. Unpopular causes are entitled to the privilege of the public arena, but they must sustain the severe burdens of that arena. So long as they are not denied the privilege, they cannot complain that their unpopularity frustrates them or that the observing public visits upon them its displeasure. Stoutness is indeed a requisite for those who would contest in that arena.

Petitioner urges that the statute contains a predetermination of its nature as a Communist-action organization—a built-in verdict against it. We find no such predetermination. Petitioner is not mentioned. Whether it does or does not fall within the description in the statute is a matter of evidence, just as it is in respect to every other respondent to a petition before the Board. A statute is not necessarily null merely because it fits a known person. Many valid statutes do.

Petitioner says the statute is a bill of attainder and therefore void. We think it is not. The opinion in the Garner case [78] discusses and disposes of the point in so far as it relates to Government employ. The remainder of the point is covered by that part of the opinion in Douds in which bills of attainder are discussed.[79] Referring to the familiar cases the Court said:

> "But there is a decisive distinction: in the previous decisions the individuals involved were in fact being punished for past actions; whereas in this case they are subject to possible loss of position only because there is substantial ground for the congressional judgment that their beliefs and loyalties will be transformed into future conduct."

We think that doctrine applies to the case at bar.

VIII

The next main subject in our consideration of the statute itself is our petitioner's attack upon Section 13(e). That section enumerates eight evidentiary considerations which it requires of the Board in determining whether an organization is Communist-action within the statutory definition. Petitioner says the section is invalid for lack of due process. It says the provisions are irrelevant, vague, and without any rational relation to the derivative facts to be established.

The eight subparagraphs of Section 13(e) direct the Board to take into consideration "the extent to which" an organization does certain things. Roughly paraphrased these are the extent to which

[79] Supra, 339 U.S. at 413-14.

(1) its activities are performed pursuant to directives or to effect the policies of the foreign government or organization in which is vested control of the world Communist movement;

(2) its policies do not deviate from those of such foreign organization;

(3) it receives financial or other ~~aid from~~ such foreign organization;

(4) it sends representatives to a foreign country for instruction in the policies or tactics of the world Communist movement;

(5) it reports to such foreign organization;

(6) its leaders are subject to the disciplinary power of such foreign organization;

(7) it operates on a secret basis for the purpose of concealing foreign domination; and

(8) its leaders consider allegiance to the United States subordinate to obligations to such a foreign organization.

The Party denominates these eight specifications "tests" and, having thus characterized them, attacks them severally and collectively.

The Party says that by the definition in Section 2 of the statute the world Communist movement engages in espionage, treason, etc., whereas none of the eight "tests" to be applied to a domestic organization involves any of those offenses; and that thus the whole of Section 13(e) is irrational. The argument misconceives both the text and the purpose of the section. The inquiry with which the statute as a whole is concerned is in two separate parts: (a) What is the world Communist movement? That is dealt with in Section 2. (b) Is a certain domestic organization under the domination and control of that movement, and does it operate primarily to achieve its objectives? The problem at the first stage of the process is the nature, etc., of a world movement known as Communism. The problem at the second stage of the process is simply whether a named organization operates to achieve the objectives of the world Communist movement, whatever the nature of that movement may be. The so-called "tests" in Section 13(e) are directed at the latter problem, and it alone. Thus construed, as it obviously was intended to be, the section is apt and cogent. We think the division of the inquiry into two steps is a rational one. Certainly it is followed in many types of inquiry.

The Party says the section is too vague to be valid. We find no such infirmity.

The Party says none of the subparagraphs in Section 13(e) specifies how much of any described activity requires a finding of, for example, foreign control; there is no quantitative standard. This argument is an attempt to make out a formula in the statute. But there is no formula. The ultimate finding is to be derived as a conclusion from basic findings. The Board may find full activities in respect to some of these matters, partial activities in respect to some, and a complete absence of activity in respect to some. The Board may make findings in other relevant respects not here enumerated. Having made these several findings, the Board must distil from the composite an ultimate finding whether the respondent is or is not under foreign control, etc. There is nothing unusual about this process; indeed it is quite elementary. It is a familiar process of adjudication based upon fact-finding. Frequently a case discloses numerous basic facts established by the evidence, upon which the trial tribunal exercises its reasoning power and deduces a derivative or ultimate finding. So in the present case.

Moreover this catalog in Section 13(e) is not exclusive. These eight items must be considered, but others which are relevant and of material effect and are offered in competent form must be considered also. Nothing in the statute hints at an exclusive criterion. The Board should, and so far as we can tell did, admit and consider whatever is competent, relevant and material.

The Party argues that evidence merely of the extent to which a respondent does these specified things does not prove or tend to prove any derivative fact in issue, e.g., domination by a foreign government. The argument is clearly without merit. High blood pressure does not prove heart disease, but any competent doctor examining a suspected bad heart would determine and take into consideration the patient's blood pressure. In legal parlance, evidence must be relevant, i.e., must relate to the issue, and must be material, i.e., must have some weight as proof, but, there is no legal doctrine that each separate item of evidence must be conclusive.

Somewhat contrary to the contentions just discussed, the Party asserts that Section 13(e) establishes presumptions and that the presumptions are irrational. We find no presumptions, and we are at a loss as to how one would spell out a presumption from the text. As aids to an ultimate conclusion the Board is directed to take into consideration the extent to which a respondent does certain things. The statute says nothing about presumptions. As we have just pointed out, it does not even specify what quantum or what character of evidence shall produce a given result. The section is a catalog of some basic considerations. There are no statutory presumptions.

The Party argues that under the statutory definition in Section 3 the basic inquiry is whether an organization operates "primarily" to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement, and that the mere "extent to which" the organization operates to advance such objectives is an irrational and irrelevant test. We are not told how the Board could ascertain whether a respondent operated "primarily" in a given manner without taking evidence upon the extent to which it so operated, and we are unable to discern how it could do so.

We next turn to the contentions in respect to the subparagraphs separately, avoiding as much as possible repetition of the general contentions already discussed.

The Party says that the "directives and policies test" in Section 13(e)(1) is irrational. It says that the statutory definition of a Communist-action organization in Section 3(3) refers only to organizations which pursue objectives which are "evil", whereas the test section refers to any objectives, good or bad.

We take it that by "evil" the Party means immediate objectives which are morally wrong. In our view the objectives here referred to need not necessarily be "evil" in that sense. If the organization in question is dominated by a foreign government or organization, as the definition prescribes, and operates primarily to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement, as the definition describes that movement, Congress may well impose upon it the sanctions of this Act, even if the active or immediate objectives are not "evil". Some of the objectives of the Soviet Union and of the world Communist movement may be excellent, even laudable; as to that we express no opinion here. If the Soviet Union has policies of peace and racial equality before the law, as the Party says it has, those are laudable objectives. Our Government has those objectives, as do many other governments. The crucial factor in the statute before us is the aim, spelled out in detail, of the world Communist movement to disestablish our system of government. Our Government may well oppose the establishment in this country of a totalitarian dictatorship of the sort described in the definition, even if such a dictatorship does not meet the definition of "evil" or even if it has many beneficent features.

The Party says the "non-deviation test" in Section 13(e)(2) is vague and irrational. We think it difficult to conceive of a more proper standard for the purpose. In an inquiry as to the domination of one organization by another, the extent of the deviation one from the other in views and policies is both relevant and material; indeed it would be one of the necessary considerations. If there were no similarity, domination would be negatived almost conclusively, whereas, if there were identity, domination would be a definite possibility, if not a certainty. Petitioner says the test includes non-deviation respecting policies calculated to secure peace and welfare as well as others characterized as evil. The argument misses the point of this section of the statute. The point is foreign domination; identity of purpose and policy, whether good or bad, is clearly relevant in the proof. Indeed the Board might conclude on this particular phase of its inquiry concerning some domestic organization that it adheres only to the admirable policies of the foreign organization, a partial non-deviation negativing domination. But the possibility of such a conclusion does not nullify the propriety of the inquiry.

Petitioner says that under the non-deviation test a respondent organization could prove its freedom from foreign domination only by proving its failure to adopt any views contrary to those of the Soviet Union. But this paragraph is not limited to absolute identity of views. We repeat once more that these subparagraphs do not constitute a formula for ascertaining foreign domination; they constitute a catalog of required considerations. They involve "the extent to which"—not "whether". So there is no merit in this contention of the Party. Furthermore, even if the statute required consideration of total identity, the provision would be valid, because, if an organization never had any policy which differed from the policies of the world Communist movement, that fact would certainly be pertinent to an inquiry into the relationship between the two. It might not be conclusive, but it would be pertinent.

Subparagraph (3) of Section 13(e) directs the Board to consider the extent to which a respondent receives "financial or other aid" from the foreign government which directs and controls the world Communist movement. The Party says the inclusion in the test of "or other aid", vitiates it. But we think not. Any type of aid received by one organization from another is pertinent to the question whether the one operates to achieve the objectives of the other. Petitioner says that, while it is an obvious truth that a contributor has a lever by which to shape the policies of the contributee, the terms of the donation are the relevant consideration and the bare fact of the donation is irrelevant. We agree that the terms of a contribution are more, even much more, material to the issue of intended influence by means of the gift, but the bare fact of the gift is not irrelevant to the consideration. It does not have the persuasive weight carried by the terms imposed by the donor, but the fact of the gift is certainly an admissible item of proof. Of course it may be explained away, as may any of the statutory specifications of considerations.

The fourth subparagraph under Section 13(e) provides that the Board shall consider the extent to which a respondent sends representatives to foreign countries for instruction in the principles or policies of the world Communist movement. The Party says that the section is invalid, because it fails to require that the Board also consider whether respondent is obliged to or does conform to what its representatives were taught. Certainly, if the Board were to make an ultimate finding of foreign domination upon the basis of bare evidence that respondent sent agents abroad, the Party would be perfectly correct upon the point. But the argument does not go to the validity of the subparagraph as such, but merely points to possible rebuttal proof and to a contention which might be addressed to findings made on this item in a particular case.

We think we need not prolong this opinion by discussing in detail the contentions made by our petitioner, the Party, in respect to the remaining four of the subparagraphs of Section 13(e). They are variations of contentions already discussed, and what we have already said applies to them.

IX

The Party says that the order of the Board is invalid because the original appointments of members to the Board were in violation of the Constitution. It says no vacancy had "happened" when the appointments were made, that vacancies did not happen during a recess of the Senate, and that in any event the appointments expired January 2, 1951. The sequence of dates is as follows:

|---|---|
| September 23, 1950 | Subversive Activities Control Act approved. |
| September 23, 1950 | Congress adjourned or recessed to a day certain. |
| October 23, 1950 | President made recess appointments. |
| November 27, 1950 | Congress reconvened. |
| November 27, 1950 | President transmitted nominations. |
| January 2, 1951 | Congress adjourned sine die. |
| April 23, 1951 | Hearings began before panel of three Board members. |
| August 9, 1951 | Senate confirmed nominations. |
| October 20, 1951 | One member retired from panel. |
| July 1, 1952 | Hearings before panel concluded. |
| July 28, 1952 | Briefs and proposed findings filed. |
| August 6, 1952 | Reply briefs filed. |
| August 14, 1952 | Argument before panel. |
| October 20, 1952 | Panel issued recommended decision. |
| November 21, 1952 | Exceptions filed. |
| November 24, 1952 | Exceptions filed. |
| January 7, 1953 | Oral argument before full Board. |
| April 20, 1953 | Report and order of the Board issued. The action of the Board was unanimous, four members signing the order. There was then one vacancy in the membership. |

We think we need not discuss this contention of petitioner at length. The minimal effect of any invalidity of appointment upon the final order is obvious from the foregoing table. The appointments were indubitably valid from August 9, 1951. The taking of evidence, which began April 23, 1951, did not conclude until July 1, 1952. The evidence was taken by a panel of members, but it could have been taken by a hearing examiner (Section 13(c) of the Act) and not by a member at all. If prior to confirmation these Board members were merely hearing officers whose taking of the testimony was thereafter ratified by the Board, the proceeding was valid. All findings and conclusions were adopted by a properly confirmed Board after hearing before that Board. The order therefore would be valid regardless of the technical legal status of the members as members prior to formal Senate confirmation. We see no need to examine further the complicated questions posed by petitioner as to constitutional recess appointments.

X

We directed the parties to discuss in a reargument the applicability of the Communist Control Act of 1954 [80] to this proceeding. In respects other than those already discussed we think it has no application. Its validity and the validity of the order before us are independent questions. Either might stand without the other.

XI

We come now to the second main part of the case, consideration of the factual findings of the Board. The problem is whether the Board's ultimate finding that the petitioner in the case at bar is a Communist-action organization within the statutory definition is or is not supported by a preponderance of the evidence in the record.

The statute says that the findings of the Board as to the facts shall be conclusive if supported by the preponderance of the evidence (Sec. 14(a)). That is a less stringent restriction upon the function of judicial review than is customary in such statutes. By the same token it imposes a laborious task upon the reviewing court. We must ascertain the preponderance of the evidence in respect to the findings as that problem is put to us by our petitioner.

Space does not permit comment upon the evidence on each minute issue of fact, or an attempt here to evaluate particles of the proof. But we can indicate the extent, nature, particularity, and personal character of the testimony presented by the Government, and the nature and extent of the evidence presented by the Party, including the character of both its denials and its explanations.

The Attorney General presented the oral testimony of twenty-two witnesses, nineteen of whom had been members of the Party. Thirteen of these nineteen had been members until 1945 or later, four of them as late as 1952. Some of them voluntarily quit the Party, some were expelled, and some were agents of the F.B.I. and acting as such during their membership.

These witnesses testified in large measure concerning practices prior to the disaffiliation of the Party from the International, but each described operations in the Party up to the time of his resignation or expulsion. They stated their views of the reasons for the present concealment of Party matters such as records, membership, etc., and their views concerning the objectives of the Party and its relationship to the world Communist organization and its leaders.

For illustrative purposes we turn to the witness Philbrick. He was an agent of the F.B.I. who from 1942 to 1944 was a member of the Young Communist League and from 1944 to 1949 a member of the Communist Party.

Thus his entire period of membership was after the disaffiliation of the Party from the International. He held several positions in the League, becoming state treasurer for its successor organization, American Youth for Democracy. He also held a series of positions with the Party, being a member of the State Educational Commission, chairman of leaflet production; then he was educational director of the Eighth Congressional District, and later a member of the "pro group", an underground group of professional people. He organized and taught Party classes. These classes studied how to apply the Communist Classics to current problems. His membership in the Party was never an open membership; at times he carried a card, and at times he did not. He identified by name a number of the Party leaders and described their activities. He described the operations and purpose of the Party builders' conference and a number of the speakers and speeches. The Daily Worker, he said, is the central organ of the Party, and every member is supposed to read it. He described the intra-Party lines of communication between groups or cells, and the caution taken in respect to meetings. The sessions of the cells were devoted to study, literature sales, and collection of dues. As literature director he furnished his cell regularly with copies of For a Lasting Peace, Political Affairs, The Worker, The Daily Worker, and many books. A principal topic of discussion in early 1948 was Zhdanov's report, which appeared in the Cominform Bulletin. Another topic was Yugoslavia and Marshal Tito. He testified that a member of the Party could not disagree with a position taken by the Cominform and remain a member of the Party. He discussed the study of capitalism in the United States as a developer of wars, and the teaching that "the true patriot is the one who fights on the side of the working class and who fights against capitalism." He testified that the basic objective of the Party while he was a member was "to establish a Soviet State in the United States following, without any deviation, the dictates and the methods laid down by Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin." He did not recall hearing any criticism by leaders of the Party directly against the Soviet Union, or any instance in which, when the policy of the Soviet seemed to differ from the policy of the United States, any leader of the Party appeared sympathetic to the United States.

The testimony of the other witnesses presented by the Attorney General as to the operation of the Party after 1940 covered other phases of the alleged operation, but the foregoing illustrates the specificity and claimed first-hand knowledge from which the witnesses spoke.

On the other side of the controversy, as we have said, the Party presented three witnesses. The testimony of John Gates reveals the tenor of that presentation. In addition to the testimony from Mr. Gates which we have already described, this witness said that he has been a member of the National Committee of the Party since 1945. The immediate objectives of the Party, he said, are the improvement of the democratic rights of the American people, and peace. The ultimate objective is a revolutionary change, the superseding of the capitalist system by a socialist system. The Party advocates the achievement of these objectives by peaceful and constitutional means. Democratic centralism, the principle which governs Party organization and function, means that all Party policies and programs are formulated by participation of every member, and once the policies are formulated, democratically, each and every member is obligated to carry out the decision. Mr. Gates denied (1) that the Party has since January, 1946, been affiliated with any other organization; (2) that it contributed to the Communist Information Bureau; (3) that any representative of the Party attended any meeting of that Bureau; (4) that any representative of the Bureau ever visited the Party; (5) that the Party ever received any directive or instruction or any written communication of any kind from the Bureau; (6) that the Party received any directives or instructions from The Lasting Peace, the newspaper which published information as to what was going on within the various Communist parties throughout the world; (7) that the Party ever received any instructions or directives from the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, or from any representative of that Party, or from any official of the Soviet Union, or from any Communist Party of any other country; (8) that the Communist Party of the United States ever sent any representative to the Soviet Union or to any other foreign country for instruction or training in Communism; and (9) that the Party reported its policies, etc., to the Soviet Government, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the Communist International, or the Communist Information Bureau. He stated that the funds of the Party are obtained entirely from dues, annual collection campaigns, and the sale of literature. In respect to the size of the Communist clubs Mr. Gates testified that there were many discussions, that they were interested in bringing about a 100 per cent activity on the part of the membership, that many Communists were being deprived of their constitutional rights, jeopardizing their means of livelihood, and that for those reasons steps were taken to protect the members, reducing the size of the clubs, eliminating lists of members and membership books. He said that the leaders of the Communist Party of the United States recognize no disciplinary power of the Soviet Government, the Communist International, the Information Bureau, or any agent thereof over an American Communist, that American Communists are not bound by any principle or doctrine to execute the decisions of foreign leaders.

Mr. Gates testified the Communists' position is that the national interests of all peoples on earth are identical; that the Party of the United States formulates its policies on the basis of a scientific approach, consisting of the general principles of Marxism-Leninism, which are general scientific principles to be applied in every situation according to time, place and circumstances; that the policies of the Party of the United States are not in many respects similar to the policies of the Party of the Soviet Union, because the circumstances differ, the United States having a capitalistic system and the Soviet a socialistic system; but that the Party of the United States agrees with the Soviet Party on peace. Mr. Gates said that he owed allegiance to the United States and to it alone.

On cross examination Mr. Gates testified that there is a world Communist movement but not of the kind described in the Attorney General's petition. He said that everything he has done is in the defense of democratic rights, economic welfare, and peace, and ultimately in the interest of the establishment of socialism, which is the first stage toward Communism. The Communist International was an actual organization of the world Communist movement, and the Party of the United States was affiliated with it at one time. He knows of no instance where the Daily Worker, while he was editor, supported this government in opposition to the Soviet Union, because it is his opinion that the Soviet has never put forward policies in any way contrary to the interests of the American people. He testified to the same effect in respect to deviation from the policies of Cominform, saying that if the Communists of the United States have expressed no disagreement with the views of The Lasting Peace it is because they believe those views have not been in contradiction to the interests of the American people. They consider the Soviet Union to be the outstanding socialist country of the world. To his knowledge the Daily Worker has never disagreed with the views and policies of the Soviet Union. It has been stated many times, although not since 1946, that the Soviet Union is the fatherland of the world proletariat. The witness contradicted a statement made by Earl Browder that during the fifteen years of the Browder leadership all major policies of the Party of the United States had the previous knowledge and consent of the international Communist leadership.

The Party attacks the credibility of the witnesses presented by the Government. In this connection it stresses that some of these witnesses were employees of the Federal Bureau of Investigation while they were members of the Party, that others were expelled from membership in the Party, and that some were under charges of false swearing. Full opportunity for cross examination of these witnesses was afforded at the hearing before the Board, and full opportunity was also afforded for the presentation of rebuttal testimony. The evaluation of credibility is primarily a matter for the trier of the facts, and a reviewing court cannot disturb that evaluation unless a manifest error has been made. Moreover the testimony of the witnesses against whom charges are said to have been made was consistent with and supported by masses of other evidence. Petitioner attacks especially the testimony of the F.B.I. operatives, as being without probative weight because they were Government operatives. But we know of no such doctrine. Government agents, especially detectives, are charged with the duty of observing operations to which they are assigned. Their testimony is a commonplace in our courts. We do not consider employment by the F.B.I. or the mere fact of expulsion from the Party as substantial bases for blanket attacks upon credibility. They might be grounds upon which the trier of the facts would receive such testimony with caution, but standing alone they do not constitute so serious a detriment to credibility as to be grounds for reversal.

XII

We come, then, to consider the disputed issues of fact. Broadly speaking, these issues concern two subjects, (1) the existence and nature of the world Communist movement and (2) the relationship of the Party USA to the world movement. We divide our consideration accordingly.

In Section 2 of the Act, as we have pointed out, Congress made findings upon the existence and the nature of the world Communist movement. Some years ago, a difference of opinion existed as to the extent to which courts are bound by legislative findings of facts in cases in which constitutional questions are posed.[81] Since then the Supreme Court has resolved the problem in American Communications Ass'n v. Douds and Galvan v. Press, both supra. The rule, as we understand it, is that, if it appears Congress has power over the subject matter of a statute, and if the findings of fact are not baseless but are based upon extensive investigation, the courts are to adopt those findings. The opinion in the Galvan case contains the following statement concerning the section, i.e., Section 2 of the Internal Security Act of 1950, which we are now considering:

> "Under the 1940 Act, it was necessary to prove in each case, where membership in the Communist Party was made the basis of deportation, that the Party did, in fact, advocate the violent overthrow of the Government. The Internal Security Act of 1950 dispensed with the need for such proof. On the basis > of extensive investigation Congress made many findings, including that in § 2(1) of the Act that the 'Communist movement * * * is a world-wide revolutionary movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship,' and made present or former membership in the Communist Party, in and of itself, a ground for deportation." (Emphasis ours.)[82]

From that viewpoint, and without going further, there is, then, for our purposes in reviewing this order under this statute, a world Communist movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, sabotage, or any other necessary means, to establish a Communist proletarian dictatorship throughout the world.

However the Board did not rely upon the Congressional findings as to these facts but thought it desirable to make independent findings based upon evidence adduced before it. That evidence was largely documentary. We refer here to a few bits of it.

Communism derives its name from Marx's The Communist Manifesto. Basic to present-day Communism is Marxism-Leninism. The meaning of Marxism-Leninism is to be found in the writings of Marx, Lenin, Stalin, and their collaborators, which works are known in this litigation as the "Classics". Marxism is a form of Socialism, the basic tenet of which is the ownership by the state of all means of production and distribution. According to Marx all society consists of antagonistic classes, the principal one being the capitalist class, which, as a result of owning privately the means of production, exploits the property-less working class. Marx expressed particular interest in the property-less factory workers, designated as the proletariat, whose numbers had increased as a result of industrialization. The conclusion of Marx was that the only true value is the labor of the industrial working class. The objective of Communism is to bring capitalism to an end and to substitute for it a dictatorship of the proletariat in a socialist state.

The Communist Party was formed in 1898 in Russia. Lenin, a Russian revolutionist who had adapted Marxism to Russian revolutionary purposes, had a group within the Communist Party called the Bolsheviks. He recognized that two things were most important to the success of the proletariat revolution: rigidity of organization and flexibility of policy. His group of Bolsheviks obtained control of the Communist Party in Russia. Organizationally he held to the necessity of creating a group of disciplined professional revolutionists, among whom no dissent would be tolerated. After the Russian revolutions of 1905 and 1917 the Communist Party destroyed capitalism in Russia and then sought help throughout the world to support their victory. Following Lenin came Stalin, who further advanced the Marxist-Leninist ideas in a practical way.

In his Problems of Leninism, published in 1934, Stalin specified as one of the three fundamental aspects of a dictatorship of the proletariat "The utilisation of the power of the proletariat for the organisation of socialism, for the abolition of classes, and for the transition to a society without classes, to a society without a state." He stressed the necessity for violence, asserting: "But, of course, the dictatorship of the proletariat does not merely mean violence, although there is no dictatorship without violence." He quoted Lenin to the same effect. In his Foundations of Leninism, published in 1939, Stalin referred to a phrase used by Marx which seemed to indicate that Marx conceded the possibility of a peaceful evolution in certain countries outside of the European Continent. But, said Stalin, Lenin pointed out that ondi-tions had changed by 1917 and he had then said that the preliminary condition for the revolution "is the smashing, the destruction of the 'ready-made state machine' ". Stalin said, "Therefore, Lenin is right in saying: 'The proletarian revolution is impossible without the forcible destruction of the bourgeois state machine and the substitution for it of a new one * * *.' "

In 1919 the First Congress of the Communist Parties, held in Moscow and headed by Lenin, founded the Communist International (called the Comintern), described by the Communists as a new type of international revolutionary proletarian organization. The theses and statutes adopted by the Comintern in 1920 contained the following:

> "The Communist International makes its aim to put up an armed struggle for the overthrow of the International bourgeoisie and to create an International Soviet Republic as a transition stage to the complete abolition of the State. The Communist International considers the dictatorship of the proletariat as the only means for the liberation of humanity from the horrors of capitalism. The Communist International considers the Soviet form of government as the historically evolved form of this dictatorship of the proletariat.
> "* * * To all intents and purposes the Communist International should represent a single universal Communist Party, of which the parties operating in every country form individual sections. * * *"

The statutes of the International contained the following:

> "Sec. 1. The new International Association of Workers is established for the purpose of organizing common activity of the workers of various countries who are striving towards a single aim: the overthrow of capitalism; the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat and of the International Soviet Republic; the complete abolition of classes, and the realization of socialism—the first step of Communist Society."

And also, among the theses and statutes of the Third International, the following expressions are to be found:

"* * * Only a violent defeat of the bourgeoisie, the confiscation of its property, the annihilation of the entire bourgeois governmental apparatus, parliamentary, judicial, military, bureaucratic, administrative, municipal, etc., even the individual exile or internment of the most stubborn and dangerous exploiters, the establishment of a strict control over them for the repression of all inevitable attempts at resistance and restoration of capitalist slavery—only such measures will be able to guarantee the complete submission of the whole class of exploiters.

* * * * *

"* * * It is especially necessary to carry on unlawful work in the army, navy, and police, as, after the imperialist slaughter, all the governments in the world are becoming afraid of the national armies, open to all peasants and workingmen, and they are setting up in secret all kinds of select military organizations recruited from the bourgeoisie and especially provided with improved technical equipment."

The Programme of the Communist International, a publication of the Workers Library Publishers, Inc., contains the constitution and rules of the Communist International. Included in these rules is the following paragraph:

"Party questions may be discussed by the members of the Party and by Party organizations until such time as a decision is taken upon them by the competent Party committees. After a decision has been taken by the Congress of the Communist International, by the Congress of the respective Sections, or by leading committees of the Comintern, and of its various Sections, these decisions must be unreservedly carried out even if a Section of the Party membership or of the local Party organizations are in disagreement with it."

The Comintern was dissolved as an organization in 1943, and four years later a new international organization, known as the Communist Information Bureau, or Cominform, was formed by the Communist Parties in countries of Europe and Asia. There is no evidence of any dissolution of the world movement or of any abandonment of the policies and program enunciated by Joseph Stalin. On the contrary, ample evidence is shown that the movement under its Soviet leaders continues as it was planned.

The foregoing is drawn from a considerable mass of material. Out of the whole of the evidence comes a picture of a world movement which has ultimate objectives and interim objectives. The ultimate objective is a classless, stateless society ruled by the proletariat of the world. The basic concepts of this ultimate objective are that the sole value is labor and that capitalism and nationalism are merely means for exploiting the masses of workers. Thus capitalism and nationalism must be destroyed. In the interim the program calls for a small, hard core of revolutionaries, formed into a disciplined Party in every country, who are a vanguard of workers and fighters for the unorganized and suppressed masses of workers. This Party is to attain control of the government of its country for the purpose of destroying its present form and, ultimately, to weld it into the stateless world society. In this interim operation the Party must be ruthless. When the Party takes over the government it is the expectation that the masses will rise and make the Party government a majority government. In this interim period the present government of Russia, the Soviet Union, because it is the first and biggest government thus far brought into control of the Communists, must be protected and preserved as Communistic at any cost.

The Board made a finding, based on evidence adduced before it, that there exists a world Communist movement substantially as described in Section 2 of the Act. We are of opinion that that finding is supported by a clear preponderance of the evidence.

XIII

We come, then, to the second main division of the facts. This deals with the policies and program of the Party USA and its relationship to the world movement. The Board, pursuant to the mandate of Section 13(e) of the Act, made findings under each of the section's eight subparagraphs, and these, in due course, we will review item by item. For the moment, however, we observe that some things disclose their nature by set characteristics, basic factors which cannot be ignored. Thus we know fish from fowl. In other words, while all relevant facts are cumulative in delineating a completed whole, it is frequently true in respect to derivative facts that certain underlying basic facts; perhaps few in number, determine the final answer. Such facts are heavy in the scales. This is the situation in the case at bar, and we turn now to consideration of some preponderant basic facts. From the record as a whole six such facts emerge as a foundation for the ultimate finding.

1. Prior to 1940 the Communist Party USA was a section of the Communist International, the Comintern. No substantial dispute exists as to this area of the past.

The Third Convention of the Party USA, held in 1921, adopted a resolution which read as follows:

> "The Communist Party will systematically and persistently propagate to the working class the idea of the inevitability of, the necessity for a violent revolution and will prepare the working class for armed insurrection as the only means for the destruction of the bourgeois state and the establishment of the proletarian dictatorship based upon soviet power."

A Special Convention of the Party USA, also held in 1921, adopted a resolution in which it "hereby reaffirms its position as an integral part of the Communist International" and unanimously adopted the 21 Points for Affiliation with the International.

Among the twenty-one conditions for membership in the International thus adopted by the Party USA were the following:

"12. All parties belonging to the Communist International should be formed on the basis of the principle of democratic centralization. At the present time of acute civil war the Communist Party will be able fully to do its duty only when it is organized in a sufficiently thorough way, when it possesses an iron discipline, and when its party centre enjoys the confidence of the members of the party, who are to endow this centre with complete power, authority and ample rights.

"16. All the resolutions of the congresses of the Communist International, as well as the resolutions of the Executive Committee are binding for all parties joining the Communist International. • • •

"17. In connection with the above, all parties desiring to join the Communist International should alter their name. Each party desirous of joining the Communist International should bear the following name: Communist Party of such and such a country, section of the Third Communist International. • • •

"21. Those members of the party who reject the conditions and the theses of the Third International, are liable to be excluded from the party."

At the Eighth Convention of the Party USA in 1934 a manifesto was adopted, which declared, among other things, "The only way out of the crisis for the toiling masses is the revolutionary way out—the abolition of capitalist rule and capitalism, the establishment of the Socialist society through the power of a revolutionary workers' government, a Soviet government."

A delegation from the Party USA attended the Seventh

Congress of the International in 1935 and were among those who formally assured Stalin "that the Communists will always and everywhere be faithful to the end to the great and invincible banner of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin. Under this banner Communism will triumph throughout the world."

Thus it is clear that in the years prior to 1940 the Communist Party USA was dominated and controlled by the world Communist movement.

The problem in dispute, then, is whether the same condition exists in present times. The Party denies that since 1940 it has been dominated or controlled from abroad. It also says: (1) Past history is not relevant or, even if relevant, is not material;[83] (2) the Party USA was disaffiliated from the Comintern in 1940; and (3) the witnesses who testified to various features of recent operations by the Party were devoid of credibility. We discuss these contentions seriatim.

The past is clearly pertinent to the present nature of a person or an organization. Surely a person's education and experience are pertinent to his present nature. The same is true of an organization. As a matter of fact it is rarely, if ever, possible to prove present nature by some instantaneous, contemporaneous fact, totally ignoring the whole of the past. Not only is the past clearly pertinent, it may be quite material to a determination of present nature. Whether it is material depends upon whether there is affirmative evidence of a departure from the established past. In the ordinary affairs of life and in ordinary litigation, if a person or an organization is shown to have had over many years a certain policy and program, and no more is shown, the conclusion is clearly indicated that he or it has the same policy and program in the present. He may prove that he has changed, and in the light of such evidence the past may lose its materiality. We are of opinion that the past nature of the Party USA is pertinent to the present inquiry and that it may or may not be material, depending upon the evidence showing a departure from the past.

[83] The Party makes an argument that only post-Act evidence, i.e., evidence relating to activities since the enactment of the statute, is pertinent in the present proceeding, and that such evidence in this record is insufficient to support the findings. We see no basis for such an evidentiary restriction upon proof as to nature, policies and program.

In line with the thought which we have just indicated, the Party says that it disaffiliated itself from the Communist International in 1940. It concludes from that fact that the established nature of its past cannot be considered in determining its present nature. But there are flaws in that contention. The disaffiliation was an organizational separation. The international organization itself was disbanded in 1943, but the world Communist movement did not then cease to exist. The movement, intact both in theory and in program, continued to exist. Stalin was the leader of the Communists long after the Comintern ceased to exist, and he, as we have noted, was the successor to Lenin and protagonist of the ideas of Marx and Lenin. To demonstrate a changed nature in the Party USA, some assertion of a change in substantive belief and program would have to be made. No such evidence was presented by the Party. The tenor of its proof was that the Communist movement is not as this statute and the Attorney General's petition pictured it. The Party witnesses did not assert a cleavage in policy or program between the Party and the international movement. At the time of the disaffiliation the convention of the Party declared that this action was "for the specific purpose of removing itself [the Party] from the terms of the so-called Voorhis Act",[84] "which law would otherwise tend to destroy, and would destroy, the position of the Communist Party as a legal and open political party of the American working class." The Party's witness Flynn described the event as "a friendly divorce".

We think a mere organizational disaffiliation, without more, does not render evidence of the Party's past immaterial to its present nature.

It seems to us, therefore, that the first major feature of the facts relating to the Party USA is that prior to 1940 the Party was part of the international Communist movement and that, although there was an organizational disaffiliation in 1940, no evidence has been presented which would indicate that since the disaffiliation the Party has repudiated either the policy or the program of the world movement.

2. The Party calls itself the "Communist Party of the United States of America". This is the name specified by the Communist International as the name by which a Party affiliated with the international movement must be known. The Communist parties in the other countries of the world are certainly motivated by a common cause. They have a common doctrinal basis and a common ultimate objective, and they have an international organization, which today, as we have noted, is known as the Communist Information Bureau, or Cominform. The Party USA is not affiliated organizationally with the Cominform, but it is difficult for us to see why the Party would call itself the Communist Party of the U.S.A. if it were not in fact a part of the Communist movement in theory and program.

3. The present organization of the Party USA resulted from a revulsion on the part of a group of its leaders against what they considered a departure from the program and principles of world Communism. In 1944 the Party underwent a reorganization under the leadership of Earl Browder. It became known as the Communist Political Association; it de-emphasized some Marxism-Leninism principles and advocated a peaceful coexistence of the United States and the Soviet Union. In the spring of 1945 a French communist by the name of Duclos published an article severely criticizing the attitude and action of the Communists in this country. Following that publication a leading Soviet Union Communist, Manuilsky, being then in San Francisco, expressed to the American Communist leaders the view that the Party USA should follow the counsel of the French Communists. Browder's leading antagonist in the Party councils was William Z. Foster, who attacked Browder as preaching anti-Communism, as fighting the Communist Party, and as being a "revisionist". For some years prior to 1940 Foster had been an official of Communist International. In July, 1945, the Communist Political Association was reorganized into the Communist Party of the U.S.A., Browder was ousted, and Foster was made the National Chairman of the Party. Six of the present leaders of the Party were members of the delegation to the convention of the International in 1935 and participated in the declaration of fealty to Stalin.

4. The amended answer of the Party says that Marxism-Leninism is basic to the Communist Party USA. And, as we have pointed out, while the tenets of Marxism-Leninism, forcefully set out in the writings of Marx, Lenin and Stalin, permit a wide flexibility in tactics, that is, of intermediate activities and objectives, they admit of no deviation from the ultimate objective, which is a classless, stateless world. If the Communist Party USA does not adhere to the basic ultimate objective of Marxism-Leninism, some vivid evidence to that effect should be readily available. Such a position on the part of the Communist Party USA would be a noteworthy fact, which surely would be reflected somewhere. But this record contains no such evidence.

In this connection the Party points to the preamble to its constitution, adopted in 1948, which contains the following sentence: "The Communist Party upholds the achievements of American democracy and defends the United States Constitution and its Bill of Rights against its reactionary enemies who would destroy democracy and popular liberties." But that recitation must be viewed in the light of the established position of Communist leaders that American democracy has gone far in protecting the rights of minorities and of working people and in advancing the economic status of such people, and that in that respect American democracy receives the plaudits of those leaders. But that position in no way negates the ultimate stateless world objective of the Communist movement. Further in this connection it is interesting to note the description of the intermediate program of the Party USA, as described by the Party through its witness Gates. Mr. Gates testified that the historic mission of the working class is the establishment of socialism; that the Party USA advocates the peaceful and constitutional road to socialism; that it advocates a party composed of a coalition of all exploited classes and believes that this party will win an election but that the monopolists will not accept this result and will use violence to overthrow the people's government; that the new government should take measures to anticipate this violence and should remove from the army, navy, and police force all generals, etc., who are sympathetic to monopolists, and replace them with officers who are sympathetic to the cause of the common people; that thus the peace government would be forced by necessity to take revolutionary measures to prevent its overthrow; and that this process is in no way contradictory to the principle of dictatorship of the proletariat.

5. We note next, without discussion, that the evidence shows that the Party press, the Daily Worker, follows the views of the publication of the Cominform, which is known as The Lasting Peace.

6. The next outstanding feature of the proof is an elaborate demonstration in the evidence presented by the Government that the Party USA has never differed in policy or program with the Soviet Union. Most notable in this evidence was the meticulous portrayal of many major international questions upon which the United States Government and the Soviet Union have differed, and the striking fact that in every such instance the Party USA has supported the position of the Soviet Union. Examples of such matters are the Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan, ECA, the North Atlantic Pact, control and inspection of atomic energy, the seating of Yugoslavia in the United Nations Security Council, the representation of China in the United Nations, the peace treaty with Japan, the William Oatis case, and the Korean War. The Party has consistently adhered to the view of the Soviet Union that the United States is an imperialistic nation which seeks world domination. Quite vivid is the identity of the course of the Party USA with the course of the Soviet Union when the latter's course changed abruptly. The Party denounced Fascism in Nazi Germany until the Hitler-Stalin Pact in 1939, when the Party switched to the Soviet Union position. When Pact was abrogated in June, 1941, and Hitler came conflict with the Soviet Union, the Party promptly switched its attitude and thereafter urged that World War II was a just war. The Party strongly opposed lend-lease aid to Great Britain. It took the same position as did the Soviet in 1947-49 in regard to the internal situation in Greece, and in 1948 in respect to the Czech government. Its course precisely paralleled the Soviet Union's actions in respect to the Tito government in Yugoslavia, including an abrupt reversal of attitude in June, 1948, when the Cominform attacked Tito. At each stage the Party supported the Soviet position in respect to the blockade of Berlin in 1948. Of current significance is the testimony and documentary evidence establishing that the Party USA and the Soviet Union express the same views regarding Korea. Both maintain that the Syngman Rhee government is a reactionary "puppet regime"; both vigorously condemn the hostilities in Korea as the direct result of imperialism and aggression; and both insist the United Nations police action was illegal and aggressive toward North Korea.

The Party does not deny the facts of the identity of the program and policies of the Soviet Union and of the Party. It makes two contentions in respect to them. In the first place it says the statutory phrase "do not deviate from" (Sec. 13(e)(2)) is the sole pertinent inquiry in respect to identity of views and policies, and that that phrase has reference only to instances where the Soviet Union first adopted a policy and the Party thereafter adopted it. That is obviously an untenable argument. The statutory phrase refers to identity or coincidence and not to chronological adoption. In the second place the Party, through its witnesses, says that the identity of views of the Soviet Union and the Party is a coincidence. Thus the witness Gates testified that while he was editor of the Daily Worker he could think of no instance where that paper supported this Government in opposition to the Soviet Union; that this was because the Soviet Union has never put forward policies in any way contrary to the interests of the American people. He said that if the Communists in this country have expressed no disagreement with the views of the Cominform it is because they believe those views have not been in contradiction to the interests of the American people. He testified that, so far as he knows, the views and policies of the Soviet Union are truly in the interests of the American people. The Party witness Flynn testified to the same effect.

It seems to us that the foregoing six considerations—(1) that the Party was prior to 1940 a section of the Communist International, and, although it was disaffiliated organizationally, it presents no evidence of a repudiation of world Communist doctrines; (2) that the Party calls itself the Communist Party of the United States of America; (3) that the present organization of the Party had its origin in a revulsion against a departure from the world Communist program; (4) that Marxism-Leninism is basic to the Party; (5) that the Party's press follows closely world Communist views; and (6) that the policies of the Party and its views upon all issues have for years been identical with those of the world Communist leaders—are the key considerations in the inquiry as to the relationship of the Party to the world movement and its leadership.

XIV.

We turn next to the mandate of Section 13(e) of the statute and to the findings made by the Board pursuant to it.

Petitioner attacks all these findings first upon the same grounds as were its attacks upon these subparagraphs as parts of the statute itself. We have discussed those contentions in detail in discussing the statute. Petitioner also attacks severally the findings under each subparagraph of the section.

Proceeding under the requirement of Section 13(e)(1) the Board made an elaborate examination of the policies and directives of the Party, devoting to the subject almost 130 pages of the printed report. Its conclusions are stated in eleven paragraphs. In substance they are that the Party's organizational forms are based upon directives of the Soviet Union and are carried out to effectuate the policies of the world Communist movement; that by the acceptance of democratic centralism the Party subjects itself to the authority of the Soviet; that the Party advocates the overthrow of imperialist governments, including the United States; and that the major programs of the Party are set forth by the Soviet for the accomplishment of the objectives of the world Communist movement. Without recapitulating or reciting the multitudinous bits of evidence which underlie these findings, we simply state that in our view a clear preponderance of the evidence supports them. As we have made clear, there is scarcely a dispute as to the period prior to 1940, and there is ample evidence in this record as a whole, when balanced against the proof offered to the contrary, to support their accuracy as to the present.

The Board found that the Party invariably follows the views and policies of the Soviet Union (Sec. 13(e)(2)). We have already discussed non-deviation as one of the chief items of evidence in the case.

The Board found, pursuant to Section 13(e)(3)), that, until the disaffiliation of the Party from the International, the Party received substantial financial aid from and at the direction of the Soviet Union and the International, but that since 1940 only one incident of such aid was shown by the record. The evidence in support of that finding is overwhelming. Indeed it is not seriously controverted. The Party's chief defense on this point is that the evidence is not relevant, a legal question we have discussed.

The Board found (Sec. 13(e)(4) and (5)) that prior to the outbreak of World War II the Party USA sent many representatives to the Soviet Union and they were trained therein Communist policies and program; and that there is no substantial evidence that such representatives were sent after the outbreak of that war. The latter conclusion is not disputed, of course; the former is overwhelmingly established. However the Board found that the Party reports to the Soviet Union, largely through representatives of the Soviet in this country. The Party's witnesses categorically denied this claim as it was presented to the Board by the Attorney General. There is little doubt about these reports having been made when the Party was a member of the International; such was one of the "conditions" of the International. There is some doubt that a preponderance of the evidence supports the broad conclusion that the Party "reports to the Soviet Union and its representatives." Such a conclusion seems to imply constant, systematic reporting as of now. The evidence indicates instances, as in the cases of Eisler and Peters. On this record we would strike this finding as phrased. There is a preponderance of evidence, we think, to support a conclusion that upon occasion leaders of the Party report to representatives of the Soviet Union.

The Board, pursuing ~~Section 13~~(e)(6), found that an iron discipline exists throughout the world Communist movement, which requires unquestioned devotion to the program laid down by the Soviet Union, and that the Party has recognized and accepted that requirement. The Party's witness Gates denied that the leaders of the Party USA consider themselves subject to the disciplinary power of the Soviet Union or of any international Communist agency.

The requirement of iron discipline within the Communist movement is one of the basic principles of the movement. It is the "democratic centralism" so vigorously insisted upon by Communist leaders in both speeches and documents. The evidence offered by the Government upon the point included the Classics, many publications, categorical assertions by witnesses on the stand, and incidents in which those who departed from the Communist program were expelled from the Party, including, among others, the experiences of Gitlow in 1929, Kornfeder in 1934, Johnson in 1940, Lautner in 1950, Tompkins in 1951, and the demotion of Browder in 1945. Identification of the Soviet Union as the leader of the world Communist movement is amply shown. It appears in documents taught in Party classes, in Communist publications, in oral testimony, and in circumstances such as the pledge of fidelity to Stalin by the International convention. We think the finding on this point is supported by a clear preponderance of the proof.

With respect to operations on a secret basis, referred to in Section 13(e)(7) of the Act, the Board made findings on a number of such practices, including concealed membership, refusal to reveal information, secretion of records, deceptive language, the use of aliases, the use of codes, false swearing, secret meetings, reduction of committee memberships, assignment of members to small groups, underground plans and operation, and the infiltration of other organizations. There is no serious dispute as to the facts in respect to these operations. Indeed the Party's witnesses testified to many of them, and the amended answer impliedly admits them. The dispute centers about the purposes of the practices. The Party contended, and now contends, that it was forced into these practices in order to protect the constitutional rights of its members to speak and to assemble, and to safeguard them from social and economic persecution. The Government says that these practices were for the purpose of concealing an unlawful conspiracy. The Board concluded that the practices were undertaken for the purposes of concealing the true nature of the Party and of promoting its objectives.

This question, whether the secret practices of the Party are for the purpose of protecting the liberties of the members or are for the purpose of promoting the objectives of the Party, is a nebulous one. The two purposes may well overlap. In so far as protection of its members from public identification as Communists also promotes the objectives of the Party, both purposes could exist together. In a doubtful situation such as that on this point, we strike the finding as to purpose. At the same time we are of opinion that the Party's view of the limited purpose of secrecy is not shown by a preponderance of the evidence. On this point we conclude simply that a defined purpose is not proven.

The Board found (Sec. 13(e)(8)) that the purposes of the Party are the antithesis of allegiance to the United States and that the Party's leaders and members consider the allegiance they owe the United States as subordinate to their loyalty and obligations to the Soviet Union. The evidence on this point is long and in great detail. Considerable testimony was given that at Communist schools students were taught that a just war is one in which the Soviet Union has as an adversary an imperialist power, that from the standpoint of a war against the Soviet Union the war is an unjust one for the adversary, and that Party members must adhere to the Soviet Union in any just war. Certainly it is clear beyond question that the Party USA regards the Government of the United States as an imperialist government, and the ultimate essence of the Communist movement is the overthrow of imperialist governments. Certainly prior to 1941 the leaders of the Party USA declared fealty to the Soviet rulers, and the same men are now leaders of the Party. The Communist Party Manual on Organization, written by J. Peters and published by the Workers Library Publishers, contains this statement:

> "The Communist Party rallies the masses against imperialistic war and fascism, and for the defense of the Soviet Union.
> "The Soviet Union is the only fatherland of workers all over the world. * * *"

Certainly it appears that the Communists bitterly assail the Socialists for advocacy of a peaceful path to power. Repeatedly in Communist publications appears the phrase "the Workers' Fatherland, the Soviet Union," or similar phrases.

The Party relies chiefly upon the text of its constitution and the testimony of the three witnesses whom it presented. The witnesses denied that they owed allegiance to any government except the United States.

The use of the term "allegiance" in connection with a relationship to the Soviet Union injects some confusion into the discussion upon this point. Allegiance implies the formalities of the oath of citizenship, the necessities of military service, etc. Of course citizens of the United States have no such "allegiance" to the Soviet. But the statute itself is not confused upon the matter. It refers to the extent to which members of an organization "consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their obligations to such foreign government or foreign organization." The latter are obligations of a nature different from technical allegiance. The Board accurately phrased the point in its key considerations, saying that the obligations which members have accepted toward the Soviet are completely incompatible with, and the exact antithesis of, allegiance to the United States. We think the conclusion is amply supported.

This opinion is too long to permit of recapitulations. The foregoing recitations will reflect the state of the facts as we find the controlling features to be shown by the record. When the parts are put together, the picture is clear and forceful.

XV

We are of opinion, as hereinabove indicated, that the statute and the order are valid as matters of law. The ultimate finding of the Board was that the Party USA "is substantially directed, dominated and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement referred to in Section 2 of the Act; and that Respondent [the Party] operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement." We conclude that this ultimate finding is supported by the basic findings which are in our opinion supported by a preponderance of the evidence, and that the ultimate finding is itself supported by a preponderance of the evidence.

The order of the Board will be

Affirmed.

BAZELON, Circuit Judge, dissenting: Suppose an Act of Congress required bands of bank robbers to file with the Attorney General statements of their membership and activities, and imposed criminal penalties upon their leaders and members for failure to do so. Such an Act would compel individuals to disclose their connection with a criminal conspiracy. No argument could reconcile such an Act with the Fifth Amendment's command that "No person * * * shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

The registration provisions of the Internal Security Act of 1950 are similar.[1] They compel individuals, under

[1] In 1951, sitting as a member of a three-judge District Court, I voted to deny the motion of the Communist Party for a preliminary injunction. 96 F.Supp. 47. The relief sought by that motion was a stay of the proceeding which the Attorney General had theretofore instituted before the Subversive Activities Control Board. I based denial of discretionary preliminary relief upon a series of estimates of probabilities, which was all we had before us. The Communist Party pointed to nothing in the conduct of the administrative proceedings themselves which would necessarily violate constitutional rights. The issue of coverage remained to be determined by the Board, which might have criminal penalties, to disclose intimate association with the Communist Party, a disclosure which the Supreme Court has held to be incriminatory.[2] Every "Communist-action" organization must register with the Attorney General,[3] list the names, aliases, and addresses of its members and officers during the preceding twelve months, and account for all money received and spent during that time.[4] The organization must register within thirty days after a final order of the Board,[5] under a penalty of $10,000 for each day's delay.[6] In addition, if it fails to register, § 7(h)[7] requires certain officers to register on its behalf.[8] If the officers do not register within sixty days after the final Board order, § 8(a) requires all individual members to register.[9] Noncompliance by individuals with either § 7(h) or § 8(a) is punishable by a fine of $10,000, five years' imprisonment, or both, for each day's delay.[10]

found that the Communist Party was not a Communist-action organization, and there was nothing in the administrative procedure or in the provision for judicial review which indicated that they were unconstitutional on their face. Since the Communist Party has now been found to be a Communist-action organization, the questions posed now are different. Because they are different, as Mr. Justice Jackson said, quoting Baron Bramwell, "The matter does not appear to me now as it appears to have appeared to me then." Kristensen v. McGrath, 340 U.S. 162, 178 (1950) (concurring opinion.)

The registration of the organization, required by § 7(a), must necessarily be executed by some individual or individuals. Congress and the Attorney General have recognized this obvious fact. Section 15(b)[11] punishes "individuals" who willfully falsify or omit a required fact in executing a registration statement required under § 7;[12] and paragraph 6 of the Attorney General's instructions which accompany the registration form for organizations (Form ISA-1) requires the statement to "be signed by the partners, officers, and directors, including the members of the governing body of the organization."

My colleagues recognize that some individual will be "called upon to sign or swear to a registration statement" and may be incriminated by having to disclose his aliases.[13] But they fail to recognize that his signing is a complete though tacit admission that he knows the names of the Party's officers and members, and its organization; that he is himself a member or a confidential employee of the Party; and that he has access to Party books and records. Blau v. United States is decisive of this case. The Supreme Court there held that an admission that one is "employ[ed] by the Communist Party or [has] intimate knowledge of its workings" might furnish a "link in the chain of evidence needed in a prosecution" under the Smith Act and therefore could not be required.[14]

It is true that the present Act does not in direct terms require any individual to execute a statement for the organization during the thirty-day period within which it must register. But of necessity and also by the Attorney General's instructions, the only individuals who can execute a statement for the organization are those upon whom § 7(h) of the Act, supplemented by § 11.205 of the Regulations, places a duty to register for the organization if it defaults;[15] and these officials are subject to the [14] 340 U.S. 159, 161 (1950). The admissions implied in executing the statements for the Communist Party are the very admissions sought from Mrs. Blau: "Mrs. Blau, do you know the names of the State officers of the Communist Party of Colorado?" "Do you know what the organization of the Communist Party of Colorado is, the table of organization of the Communist Party of Colorado?" "Were you ever employed by the Communist Party of Colorado?" "Mrs. Blau, did you ever have in your possession or custody any of the books and records of the Communist Party of Colorado?" "Did you turn the books and records of the Communist Party of Colorado over to any particular person?" "Do you know the names of any persons who might now have the books and records of the Communist Party of Colorado?" "Could you describe to the grand jury any books and records of the Communist Party of Colorado?" Id. at 160, n. 1. See cases collected 19 A.L.R. 2d 388.

[15] Under the statute the duty to register falls upon the organization's executive officer, secretary, or the individuals performing the ordinary and usual duties of such officers, and upon such other officers as the Attorney General may prescribe. Under the regulation, "(a) The president, chairman, or other person who is chief officer of the organization. (b) The vice-president, vice-chairman, or person performing similar function. (c) The treasurer. (d) Members of the governing board, council, or body" "jointly with the executive officer and secretary" are made liable to register for the organization after the expiration of thirty days. It severe criminal penalties of § 15(a)(2)[16] if they fail to perform this duty. Since they will be subject to criminal penalties for failure to register shortly after the thirty-day period has run,[17] as a practical matter they are under heavy pressure to prevent it from running.[18] The "compulsion prohibited by the fifth amendment is not alone physical or mental duress, such as comes from unlawful commands and authoritative orders, * * *,"[19] "the test being whether all things considered the testimony in question was voluntarily given."[20] will be recalled that paragraph 6 of the Attorney General's instructions specifies that the organizational registration form shall be signed by the organization's "partners, officers, and directors, including the members of the governing body * * *."

[16] The officers are subject to a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment of five years for each offense. Any offense is defined as one day's failure to register, so that two weeks' nonregistration could mean a fine of $140,000, seventy years in prison, or both.

[17] The designated officers must file the statement within ten days after the organization's thirty-day period has run. Regulations, § 11.205, 19 FED. REG. 6036.

[18] Cf. United States v. Bell, 81 Fed. 830, 837 (W.D.Tenn. 1897), where it was held that a witness, although "technically not under the compulsion of a subpoena," had nevertheless been under compulsion in testifying before an "official having the power to compel him to come, if he should be recalcitrant about it * * *."

[19] United States v. Bell, 81 Fed. 830, 837 (W.D.Tenn. 1897); cf. Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 621-22 (1886) (holding that it is equivalent to the compulsory production of papers to make their nonproduction a confession of the allegations it is contended they will prove); and see McKnight v. United States, 115 Fed. 972, 981 (6th Cir. 1902).

Nor are the compulsory self-incrimination provisions of the Act saved by § 4(f). That section provides that "the fact of registration of any person * * * shall not be received in evidence * * * in any prosecution for any alleged violation of subsection (a) or subsection (c) or for any alleged violation of any other criminal statute." [21] Since this provision merely bars the "fact of registration" as evidence, and leaves the registrant exposed to prosecution for everything to which the registration relates, it does not meet the command of the Supreme Court in Counselman v. Hitchcock. There, as here, a statute prevented use of extorted disclosures as "evidence" in any criminal proceeding but, as the Court pointed out, the statue did not prevent their use "to search out other testimony to be used in evidence * * * in a criminal proceeding." No grant of immunity is sufficient unless it provides "complete protection from all the perils against which the constitutional prohibition was designed to guard." [22] Nothing less than "absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offence to which the question relates" can serve as a "full substitute for that [constitutional] prohibition." [23]

But my brethren say, in effect, that under the doctrine of United States v. White,[24] no officer of the Communist Party can assert the constitutional privilege to avoid giving information about the organization which § 7(a) requires. I do not think the White doctrine can be so applied.

In White an officer of a labor union had appeared before a grand jury in response to a subpoena duces tecum but had declined to produce union documents. His mere appearance as a union officer was not, and was not claimed to be, incriminatory. Instead, he invoked the privilege on the theory that the demanded documents were incriminating. The Court replied that he could not "place under the protective shield of the privilege * * * official union documents held by him in his capacity as a representative of the union." [25] The vice of the present statute is not that it compels someone to produce incriminatory documents, but that it compels someone to identify himself as a Communist Party functionary. Such identification, unlike identification as a corporate or union official, is incriminatory under the Blau case.[26] That situation was not involved in White, nor in Rogers v. United States, since the witness there had "freely described her membership, activities and office in the Party." [27] This fundamental difference makes the White case inapplicable. There are two further distinctions.

(1) Section 7(d) requires the preparation of a statement naming the organization, listing its members and officers (and their aliases), describing the officers' duties and functions, and accounting for money received and

[27] 340 U.S. 367, 372 (1951). In United States v. Field, 193 F.2d 109 (2d Cir. 1951), an official of the Bail Fund Committee of the Civil Rights Congress declined to produce the organization's documents on the ground that to do so would in itself be incriminatory. The argument was rejected by the Second Circuit solely on the ground that earlier, in the same proceeding, he had admitted being a trustee of the fund.

spent. Hence incriminating information is, in effect, "forced from the lips of the [executing officer], rather than obtained from the records or books." [28] As the Second Circuit has held, "the production of records must be distinguished from * * * testimony as to what the records would contain, had they been produced." [29]

(2) I do not think the White doctrine applies even as to books and records of the Communist Party, notwithstanding the dictum in Rogers that there is no privilege with respect to the books of the Party. Under the White test, the privilege is unavailable to officers of an organization only when the organization's character is "so impersonal in the scope of its membership and activities that it cannot be said to embody or represent the purely private or personal interests of its constituents, but rather to embody their common or group interests only." [30] The "impersonal" criterion, as discussed by the Court, clearly indicates that unions, other lawful associations, and corporations are to be distinguished from

See Note, The Internal Security Act of 1950, 51 COL.L.REV. 606, 621 (1951), where the author states: "The execution of a registration statement by an individual would at least require him to confirm and transpose selected material from the organization's records to the registration statement. Since an organization need not keep complete records prior to registration, in many cases the officer would be forced to execute the registration statement by relying on his own knowledge. It is clear that in both instances the officer is doing more than producing records and identifying them. He is disclosing other matters of his personal knowledge."

criminal conspiracies.[31] Only by ignoring the history of the decade since White can the Communist Party be equated to an ordinary corporation, union or association. For in that decade it has been established that officers of the Communist Party are engaged in a conspiracy to violate the Smith Act.[32] Since these officers, unlike the officers of "impersonal" organizations, are co-conspirators, bound by the acts of other officers in pursuance of the conspiracy and subject to criminal penalties for such acts, the White case does not touch the self-incrimination problems posed by this Act.

In Boyd v. United States [33] the Supreme Court declared "unconstitutional and void" a statute which merely imposed economic pressure to produce incriminating documents. State courts have invalidated various statutes that compelled self-incrimination,[34] including two that re-

[31] In finding unions similar to corporations, the Court enumerated features common to both which are clearly inapplicable to criminal conspiracies: "Duly elected union officers have no authority to do or sanction anything other than that which the union may lawfully do"; "no member or officer has the right to use [the union's books and records] for criminal purposes * * *"; "the actions of one individual member no more bind the union than they bind another individual member unless there is proof that the union authorized or ratified the acts in question"; and "the members are not subject to either criminal or civil liability for the acts of the union or its officers as such unless it is shown that they personally authorized or participated in the particular acts." 322 U.S. at 702.

[34] In re DeWar, 148 A. 489 (Vt. 1930) (statute requiring persons convicted of intoxication to disclose name of person from whom liquor obtained held "unconstitutional and void"); People v. Reardon, 90 N.E. 829 (N.Y. 1910) (statute quired members of the Communist Party to register,[35] I would do the same with the present statute. Section 14(a)[36] permits a "party aggrieved" by respondent's order to obtain judicial review. Plainly the Communist Party is "aggrieved." Therefore it may challenge the legality of the Board's order even though the constitutional rights invaded are those of other persons and not of the Party itself.[37]

The Government and my brethren would postpone determination of constitutionality until a Communist Party official has declined to register for the Party on self-incrimination grounds. First, they say that an official may register voluntarily. But as I have pointed out, the coercion to register precludes voluntary compliance as a matter of law. In Boyd the Supreme Court held a statutory disclosure requirement "void" although, theoretically at least, someone within its scope might at some time have voluntarily made the required disclosures. Second, they argue that a Communist Party official might suffer no "substantial detriment" either because he had already disclosed his Communist affiliations in other proceedings or because he had already been convicted under the Smith Act. But the privilege can never be lost in any such

way. "The privilege is not waived by testimony given in a previous proceeding, even in the same case."[38] It is waived only by testimony in the same proceeding. Hence the individuals referred to by my brethren as having admitted Communist Party affiliations at the hearing before the Board did not thereby waive their privilege.[39] And the previous conviction of some Communist Party officials confers no immunity upon them from further prosecution based upon later Communist affiliation. Third, it is urged that the privilege "must be specifically asserted at the time a particular question is asked * * *."[40] But that doctrine applies only where it is not plain from the inquiry itself that incriminating disclosures are demanded.[41] It is plain here. Since any person who comes forward, even to claim the privilege, thereby identifies himself as a Communist Party functionary,[42] to require him to claim the privilege would, in the words

[39] In the three-judge court suit brought by the Communist Party (see n. 1, supra), one of the grounds urged for enjoining hearings before the Board was that to properly defend itself at such hearings Communist Party officials would necessarily have to testify and that such testimony would necessarily entail their admission of Communist Party affiliations. Those officials who testified at the hearing did so only after denial of relief in that suit. Moreover, they testified more than two years ago. A fresh disclosure of continued Party office would clearly constitute a "substantial detriment," particularly in view of the intervening Board determination that the Party is a Communist-action organization.

[41] In a judicial or legislative proceeding, where most questions asked will not necessarily require incriminating answers, the tribunal must be put on notice that in a particular instance the Fifth Amendment may apply. See, e.g., Vajtauer v. Commissioner, 273 U.S. 103, 113 (1927), where the Court said: "It is for the tribunal conducting the trial to determine what weight should be given to the contention of the witness that the answer sought will incriminate him, a determination which it cannot make if not advised of the contention. The privilege may not be relied on and must be deemed waived if not in some manner fairly brought to the attention of the tribunal which must pass upon it." [Emphasis supplied.] Similarly, under a revenue statute requiring all taxpayers to give information about their sources of income either in a return or an investigation, the enforcing authorities must be put on notice that as to a particular taxpayer the Fifth Amendment may bar the required disclosure. See United States v. Sullivan, 274 U.S. 259, 263 (1927), where the Court said: "If the form of return provided called for answers that the defendant was privileged from making he could have raised the objection in the return, but could not on that account refuse to make any return at all." The matter was well expressed by the Seventh Circuit in Murdock v. United States, 62 F.2d 926, 927 (1932): "* * * a citizen from whom information is sought under a statute enacted pursuant to authority granted to Congress by the Sixteenth Amendment may invoke or waive the protection provided by the Fifth Amendment. And likewise the courts will compel the production of information, subject, however, to the right of said taxpayer to justify his refusal so to do by showing facts that bring him within the protection of the Fifth Amendment. Thus construed, the statute under consideration is not unconstitutional." [Emphasis supplied.]

of Chief Justice Marshall, "strip him of the privilege which the law allows * * *."[43]

In reviewing administrative action, the court "may adjust its relief to the exigencies of the case in accordance with equitable principles governing judicial action."[44] Equitable principles, even in the absence of a statute providing for judicial review, justify the relief I would grant in this case. Truax v. Raich is in point. There the complainant was an alien employee who was threatened with discharge because of a state statute which penalized only the employer for employing more than a certain percentage of aliens. It did not penalize employees. The Supreme Court held the threatened injury to the complainant brought the case "within the class in which, if the unconstitutionality of the act is shown, equitable relief may be had."[45] And Government officers have been enjoined "from bringing criminal proceedings to compel obedience to unconstitutional requirements."[46]

Since Congress has enlarged the area of incrimination with regard to the Communist Party, and since the Supreme Court has found the enlargement permissible, we must see that the constitutional guarantee against compulsory self-incrimination is co-extensive with the widened danger.

The Fifth Amendment, as Dean Griswold has said, "is a clear and eloquent expression of our basic opposition to collectivism, to the unlimited power of the state. It would never be allowed by Communists, and thus it may well be regarded as one of the signs which sets us off from Communism." [47]

Since I would void the Act on Fifth Amendment grounds, I do not consider the petitioner's other contentions.

PAGE

A. Whether the Act violates due process or is a bill of attainder because it predetermines, by legislative fiat, facts essential to the ultimate determination that petitioner is a "Communist-action" organization ..... 47

B. Whether the Act violates due process because it authorizes a determination that an organization is a Communist-action organization on the basis of irrational and vague criteria ..... 51

C. Whether the Act violates due process by establishing a Board which is necessarily biased, and has an interest in deciding, against petitioner, and whether petitioner was, in fact, denied a fair hearing ..... 54

D. Whether the Act violates due process by depriving petitioner's members of liberty and property merely by reason of their association, without proof of scienter and without according them a hearing ..... 55

E. Whether the registration requirement of the Act violates due process by virtue of the fact that Section 5 of the Communist Control Act makes it impossible to determine who must be registered as members ..... 57

F. Whether the Act is invalid because it violates the privilege against self-incrimination ..... 58

G. Whether the Act, on its face and as applied, violates the First Amendment ..... 59

III. The action of the court below in sustaining the order of the Board after striking two of the key findings on which it was based violates the Act and is in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court ..... 66

IV. The decision below determines important questions concerning the interpretation and application of the Act. Some of these have not been, but should be, settled by this Court, and others were decided in a manner which conflicts with applicable decisions of this Court ..... 68

A. Whether the order of the Board and the decision below violate the Act for the reason that they rest on alleged conduct of petitioner which, if it ever occurred, was discontinued prior to the date of the Act ..... 68

B. Whether the Board and the court below otherwise erroneously construed and applied the criteria of section 13(e) of the Act ..... 71

C. Whether the Board and the court below erroneously construed and applied the Act's definition of the world Communist movement ..... 75

D. Whether the court below violated section 14 of the Act by denying petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence ..... 76

E. Whether the findings of the Board are unsupported by the preponderance of the evidence, and whether the Report of the Board and the opinion below demonstrate on their face the insufficiency of the evidence ..... 78

V. The original "recess" appointments of the members of the Board present a constitutional question as to their validity which has not been, but should be, determined by this Court ..... 80

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

No. .....

COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Petitioner,

v.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD.

Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

Communist Party of the United States of America petitions that a writ of certiorari issue to review a judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit (R. 2172; Appendix A herein)[1] which affirmed (Judge Bazelon dissenting) an order of the Subversive Activities Control Board (R. 138) that the petitioner register as a Communist-action organization under Section

[1] We use "R." to refer to the record from the court below, which consists of the Joint Appendix below and the proceedings in that court. "Tr." refers to the transcript of the proceedings before the Subversive Activities Control Board, filed with this Court by order of the court below and pursuant to Rule 21(3) of this Court. "A. G. Ex." refers to an exhibit offered by the Attorney General in the proceeding before the Board. "C. P. Ex." refers to an exhibit offered in that proceeding by the petitioner herein.

OPINION BELOW

The opinion of the court below has not yet been reported. It appears in the record at 2083-2171. The Report of the Subversive Activities Control Board appears in the record at 1-137. It has been published as Sen. Doc. No. 41, 83d Cong., 1st Sess.[3]

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court below is dated, and was entered, on December 23, 1954. Petition for rehearing was denied on January 14, 1955 (R. 2199, 2200). Jurisdiction of this Court is conferred by Section 14(a) of the Act and 28 U. S. Code 1254.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Whether the provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 as amended, relating to Communist-action organizations and their members, and as supplemented by section 5 of the Communist Control Act of 1954, are unconstitutional on their face or as applied in this case.

[2] The Subversive Activities Control Act, as amended, is hereafter referred to as the Act. It is Title 1 of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

[3] Pursuant to Rule 23(1)(i) of this Court, we have filed with the Court pamphlet copies of the opinion of the court below and of the Report and Order of the Board. References to the court's opinion will be designated "Op." and will be to the pagination of the pamphlet copy. The pagination of the Report of the Board is the same as in the record from the court below, and references to the Report will be designated "R."

2. Whether the court below, having stricken two of the key findings on which the Board based its order, erred in failing to remand the proceeding for administrative redetermination.

3. Whether the order of the Board and the decision below are erroneous because they rest on alleged conduct of petitioner which admittedly was discontinued long before the enactment of the Act.

4. Whether the court below and the Board erroneously interpreted and applied section 13(e) of the Act.

5. Whether the court below and the Board erroneously interpreted and applied the Act's definition of "world Communist movement."

6. Whether the Report of the Board and the opinion below demonstrate on their face that the Board's findings are unsupported by the preponderance of the evidence.

7. Whether the order and findings of the Board are unsupported by the preponderance of the evidence.

8. Whether petitioner was denied a fair hearing because of the extra-legal pressures exerted upon the Board members to decide against petitioner and because of the refusal of the Board to disqualify members Brown and McHale upon petitioner's affidavits of bias and prejudice.

9. Whether the denial by the court below of petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence violated section 14 of the Act and was an abuse of discretion.

10. Whether the order of the Board should have been set aside because part of the administrative hearing was conducted by "recess" appointees to the Board whose appointments were invalid or had expired under article 2, section 2, clause 3 of the Constitution.

STATUTES INVOLVED

The pertinent provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act, as amended, the Immigration and Nationality Act, and the Communist Control Act of 1954, are set forth in Appendix B hereof.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. The Act

1. Its Enactment.

The Act originated in proposals advanced by the House Committee on Un-American Activities. While the bill was pending, the President sent Congress a special message in which he commented on the bill as follows (H. R. Doc. No. 679, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 5-6):

> "Once a government is committed to the principle of silencing the voice of opposition, it has only one way to go, and that is down the path of increasingly repressive measures, until it becomes a source of terror to all its citizens and creates a country where everyone lives in fear.
> "We must therefore be on our guard against extremists who urge us to adopt police state measures. Such persons advocate breaking down the guarantees of the Bill of Rights in order to get at the Communists. They forget that if the Bill of Rights were to be broken down, all groups, even the most conservative, would be in danger from the arbitrary power of the government.
> "Legislation is now pending before the Congress which is so broad and vague in its terms as to endanger the freedoms of speech, press and assembly protected by the first amendment. Some of the proposed measures would, in effect, impose severe penalties for normal political activities on the part of certain groups, including Communists and Communist Party-line followers. This kind of legislation is unnecessary, ineffective, and dangerous."

The bill was passed, and the President vetoed it. He stated in his veto message (H. R. Doc. 708, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 5):

> "Unfortunately, these [registration] provisions are not merely ineffective and unworkable. They represent a clear and present danger to our institutions."

Congress overrode the veto on September 23, 1950.

2. Organizations Covered

The Act provides for administrative proceedings before the Board, upon petitions of the Attorney General, to determine whether or not accused organizations shall be required to register as "Communist-action" or "Communist-front" organizations (Sec. 13). The Communist Control Act of 1954 adds provisions authorizing the Board, on petitions of the Attorney General, to declare organizations to be "Communist-infiltrated" (Secs. 3(4A) and 13A of the Act, added by Sec. 7 of the Communist Control Act). These latter are not required to register, but are deprived of the benefits of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The three types of organizations are collectively referred to as "Communist organizations" (Sec. 3(5)).

The definitions of Communist organizations are tied into findings made in Section 2 of the Act. Section 2 finds, among other things, that there exists a world Communist movement, controlled by the Communist dictatorship of a foreign country, which seeks by treacherous and terroristic methods, and through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization, to overthrow capitalist governments and establish in their place totalitarian dictatorships subservient to the foreign dictatorship.

A Communist-action organization is defined as one "which (i) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement referred to in Section 2 of this title, and (ii) operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement as referred to in section 2 of this title" (Sec. 3(3)).

A Communist-front organization is defined as an organization which is substantially dominated or controlled by a Communist-action organization and is primarily operated for the purpose of giving aid or support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement (Sec. 3(4)).

A Communist-infiltrated organization is defined as one which is substantially dominated or controlled by an individual or individuals who are, or within three years have been, engaged in giving support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement, and is serving, or within three years has served, as a means for giving aid or support to any such organization, government, or movement, or for the impairment of the military or industrial strength of the United States (Sec. 3(4A)).

3. Consequences of a Registration Order

A Communist-action organization is required to register as such with the Attorney General. The registration statement must show the names and addresses of the organization's officers and members during the preceding year, give a detailed accounting of all moneys received and expended, including the source of its revenues and the purposes of its expenditures, and list all printing and duplicating facilities. Annual reports must be filed to keep the registration up to date. The registration statement is open for public inspection (Sec. 7).[4]

When a registration order becomes final, as it does on exhaustion of judicial review (Sec. 14(b)), the officers of the organization have an individual duty to register the organization and to list its members (Sec. 7(h)). Members not so listed are under a duty to register themselves after an adininistrative determination of their membership (Secs. 8, 13(a)). Failure to comply with these duties is punishable by imprisonment up to five years, fine up to $10,000, or both. These penalties are potentially astronomical since each day of failure to register constitutes a separate offense. Any falsity in a registration statement is punishable by a similar penalty. Here, too, astronomical accumulation is made possible because each misstatement and each omission is a separate offense (Sec. 15).

The listing or self-listing of members of petitioner in compliance with a registration order has been made an impossible task by Section 5 of the Communist Control Act. That section enumerates thirteen criteria for determining "membership" in the Communist Party. These are dependent on facts of which the petitioner and its officers can have no knowledge, and in addition are so vague and irrational that individuals cannot determine whether or not they are "members".[5]

Any person whose name is listed on a registration statement as an officer or member of, or a contributor to, the organization is in jeopardy of prosecution under the extravagantly vague sedition provisions of Section 4(a) of the Act,[6] as well as under the Smith Act and a host of state laws.

[5] For example, the twelfth criterion of membership is whether the individual "has indicated by word, action, conduct, writing or in any other way a willingness to carry out, in any manner and to any degree the plans, designs, objectives, or purposes of the organization." Other criteria are no more definite. Furthermore, the irrationality of section 5 is apparent from the introductory clause alone, which establishes identical criteria to prove such divergent facts as "membership" in petitioner, "participation" in petitioner, and "knowledge" of petitioner's purpose or objective.

[6] Section 4(a) makes it criminal to conspire "to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship" under foreign control. And see infra, p. 11, for a list of other federal criminal statutes which might be invoked against members of a registered organization.

In addition, the entry of a final registration order automatically makes operative crippling sanctions against the organization and its members. These sanctions apply whether or not the organization registers.

The sanctions are the following:

(1) The organization must label publications and literature which it distributes by mail or in interstate or foreign commerce as being disseminated by a Communist organization, which is defined as a participant in a seditious conspiracy. Its radio and television broadcasts must be announced as sponsored by a Communist organization. These requirements apply without regard to the nature and content of the publications and broadcasts (Sec. 10).

(2) Members of the organization may not hold nonelective federal employment, employment in any privately owned "defense facility," or office or employment in labor unions; nor may they represent employers in matters arising under the National Labor Relations Act (Sec. 5, as amended by Sec. 6 of the Communist Control Act). A defense facility is any establishment listed by the Secretary of Defense on his ex parte determination that the security of the United States requires such listing (Secs. 3(7), 5(b)). Accordingly, what employment is open to members of the organization, and, for that matter, whether any employment at all is open to them, rests in the unreviewable fiat discretion of the Secretary of Defense.

(3) Government employees and employees of defense facilities are prohibited from contributing funds or services to the organization. Accordingly, the ex parte determination of the Secretary of Defense limits, or may virtually eliminate, the sources from which the organization can obtain funds or services (Sec. 5).

(4) Members of the organization may not hold, or apply for, passports (Sec. 6).

(5) Alien members of the organization are excluded from admission into the United States, and if already in the country, must be deported. An alien may not be naturalized if he was a member of the organization within ten years preceding the filing of his naturalization petition. Naturalized citizens who become members of, or who affiliate with, the organization within five years after naturalization are subject to revocation of citizenship.[7]

(6) Contributions to the organization are not tax deductible, and the organization itself is denied tax exemptions (Sec. 11).

The prohibitions described in the first four paragraphs above are enforceable by criminal penalties of up to five years imprisonment and $10,000 fine (Sec. 15).

The sanctions on members apply regardless of the personal innocence of the members and their lack of knowledge of alleged illegal or conspiratorial actions or purposes, and though their activities are confined to constitutionally protected areas.

The registration order has still other consequences, as follows:

(1) It officially brands the organization, its members and contributors, as treasonable conspirators, and subjects them to public opprobrium and ensuing social and economic reprisals.

(2) The Act makes it dangerous for other organizations or persons to associate with the proscribed organization or its members or to forward by constitutionally protected means social, economic, or political changes supported by the proscribed organization. Under the Act's evidentiary criteria of front and infiltrated organizations, an organization which has any dealings with or expresses views similar to those of an organization proscribed as a Communist-action organization or its members, is itself in danger of being proscribed as a front or infiltrated organization (Secs. 13(f), 13A(e)). Moreover, under the sweeping criteria of Section 5 of the Communist Control Act, any person who has any contact or dealings with the Communist Party or its members may thereby be determined to be a member of the Party, become liable to register as such, incur the other penalties for membership, and jeopardize the status of any organization to which he belongs. A registration order therefore puts the organization into a quarantine, depriving it of access to the people and the people of access to ideas propagated by it.

The total impact of the Act is such, therefore, that if the organization registers, it destroys itself and jeopardizes the livelihood and liberty of its members. Furthermore, the organization and its officers incur astronomical criminal penalties for the inevitable "false statements" and "omissions" in registration, which are induced by Section 5 of the Communist Control Act. If a member registers, he destroys himself. On the other hand, if there is no registration, the organization, its officers and members are subject to severe criminal penalties for each day of non-registration.

An organization ordered to register is, therefore, given the illusory choice of organizational and political suicide by registration or governmental execution for non-registration. The registration order does not, and was not intended to, result in registration, which the Act makes an impossible alternative. Its function is to lay a foundation for the imposition of destructive penalties, whether or not there is registration; for mass prosecution of the organization's members, if there is no registration; and for the issuance of similarly destructive orders against other organizations on findings that they are "fronts" or "infiltrated".

The order is not a means for obtaining the disclosure of information. Its purpose and effect is to outlaw the organization and so to prevent it from disclosing its views to the American people. The Attorney General has acknowledged that the registration order in this case, if sustained, will result in outlawing or destroying petitioner.[8]

4. The Act's Predetermination of the Administrative Order

The determination of whether an organization is "Communist", is made administratively by the Board, after hearing (Sec. 13). Provision is made for judicial review by the Court of Appeals and on grant of certiorari by this Court. On judicial review, the Board's findings of fact are conclusive only if supported by the preponderance of the evidence (Sec. 14(a)).

The Act purports to require the registration of Communist-action organizations and their members as participants in a foreign-controlled conspiracy to commit espionage, sabotage, treason, violent revolution, etc., on behalf of a foreign power. The activities claimed to supply justification for the registration requirements are, of course, already punishable under numerous federal criminal statutes,[9] and, if not already punishable, could easily be made so. The Act thus establishes a mechanism to prosecute accused persons not for their alleged crimes, but for their failure to register themselves as criminals. The explanation for this shift of the locus of punishment from the crime itself to failure to register as a criminal is that the Act seeks to punish Communists as criminal conspirators even though they are not and cannot be proved to be such. The legislative history and the scheme of the Act show that such is its purpose and effect.

The legislative history of the Act discloses the following:

(1) The sponsors of the legislation were bent on outlawing the Communist Party by a legislative fiat determining that it is a foreign agent and requiring it to register as such. The first ancestor of the Act, the Mundt bill (H. R. 4422, 80th Cong., 1st Sess.), would have required the Communist Party by name to register as a foreign agent, without judicial or quasi-judicial determination of the facts. However, the Congress was informed by Attorney General Clark and various constitutional authorities, testifying before the legislative sub-committee of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, that such an approach was probably unconstitutional as fiat legislation violating the due process and bill of attainder clauses. Hearings on Proposed Legislation to Curb or Control the Communist Party of the United States, before Sub-Committee on Legislation of the Committee on Un-American Activities, H. throw of government); 2381 (treason); 2382 (misprision of treason); 951 (failure to register as foreign agent); 957 (possession of property of a foreign government for use in violating United States statute); 2387-2388 (undermining loyalty, discipline, or morale of the armed forces); 2386 (failure to register by organizations engaged in civilian military activity, subject to foreign control, affiliated with foreign government, or seeking to overthrow government by force); 1361-1364 (damaging federal property or communications); 1381 (enticing desertion and harboring deserters); 2390 (enlistment to serve against United States).

80th Cong., 2d Sess., on H. R. 4422 and 4581, pp. 19-20, 113, 115, 117, 209-11, 256, 432, 493-95.[10]

Because of these warnings, the Committee on Un-American Activities rejected the crude approach of the Mundt bill and reported the Mundt-Nixon bill (H. R. 5852, 80th Cong., 2d Sess.), which first proposed the scheme of an administrative proceeding to determine registerable organizations. Representative Nixon, Chairman of the legislative sub-committee of the Un-American Activities Committee, and co-author of the bill, explained the reason for the change to the Senate Judiciary Committee (emphasis added):

> "From having heard the witnesses before our Committee, we came to the conclusion that naming the Communist Party by name and attempting to build the entire registration provisions around such a definition was an unconstitutional approach and consequently the committee attempted to find a legislative device for meeting the problem in a constitutional manner. • • •
> "That is the reason that we do not name the Communist Party." [11]

The House and Senate Committees also informed the Congress in their reports on the bill which became the Act:

> "To make membership in a specifically designated existing organization illegal per se would run the risk of being held unconstitutional on the ground that such an action was legislative fiat" (H. Rep. No. 2980, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., on H. R. 9490, p. 5; Sen. Rep. No. 1358, 81st Cong., 1st Sess., on S. 2311, p. 9).

(2) The "problem" to which Representative Nixon referred in his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee is also revealed by the legislative history. As Attorney General Clark advised the legislative subcommittee of the Un-American Activities Committee, there already existed legislation which required registration of foreign agents and "subversive" organizations (the Foreign Agents Registration Act and the Voorhis Act) and which prohibited advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force and membership in a group of persons who so advocate (the Smith Act). The Attorney General also informed the Congress, however, that the Communist Party and its members could not be proved to have violated these statutes. This caused the House and Senate Committees to conclude that the existing legislation was "ineffectual" and "inadequate". House Hearings, pp. 21-22; Sen. Rep. No. 1358, supra, p. 7; H. Rep. No. 2980, supra, p. 2.

The Act was an attempt to solve the dilemma that to name the petitioner was unconstitutional and to require proof was "ineffectual". While not specifically naming petitioner, the Act guaranteed that petitioner would be ordered to register as a seditious foreign agent without proof of either sedition or foreign agency. This result was accomplished by three devices:

1. The findings essential to guilt are made by the Act, and are not the subject of independent adjudication by the Board.

Under the definition contained in Section 3(3), there can be a Communist-action organization in the United States only if there is a world Communist movement subject to the control and having the objectives described in Section 2. However, the existence and nature of the world Communist movement are not issues left to adjudication by the Board. Instead, these "facts" are found by Congress in Section 2. The findings are then incorporated into Section 3(3) in the form of assumptions of fact which the Board is not authorized to re-examine, but is required to accept as the foundation for its decision.

The correctness of these legislative findings regarding the world Communist movement is also assumed by the eight criteria which Section 13(e) requires the Board to apply in deciding whether an accused organization is a Communist-action organization. Seven of the eight criteria require the Board to act on the assumption that a world Communist movement exists and has the characteristics found in Section 2.[12]

The respondent admitted in its brief below (pp. 61-62), and the court below held (Op. 55-56), that the Section 2 findings on the existence and nature of the world Communist movement were binding on the Board and the court, and that these matters were not subjects for adjudication.

It is thus undisputed that a determination of key facts which constitute the necessary foundation for a finding that an organization is a Communist-action organization has been made by legislative fiat and is not within the competence of the Board.

Section 2 also predetermines other aspects of the Board's findings. It finds that "the Communist organization in the United States" engages in practices which satisfy the definition of an action organization (2(15)) and has characteristics which satisfy four of the eight criteria which the Board is supposed to apply under Section 13(e). Cf. 2(5) with 13(e)(6); 2(6) with 13(e)(1); 2(7) with 13(e)(7); 2(9) with 13(e)(8).

By legislative fiat, Section 2 thus predetermines virtually all of the elements requisite for the entry of a registration order, including the supposed existence, nature, and foreign control of a world Communist movement, and the existence, purposes, and characteristics of an organization which it finds to be the domestic agent of that movement.

[12] Thus the first of the evidentiary standards of 13(e) is "the extent to which" an accused organization's policies are formulated and its activities performed pursuant to directives or to effectuate the policies "of the foreign government or foreign organization in which is vested, or under the domination or control of which is exercised, the direction and control of the world Communist movement, referred to in section 2." All the remaining standards, except 13(e)(7), refer back to "such foreign government or foreign organization" or "such world Communist movement."

All that remained for the Board, therefore, was to supply the name of the particular organization which Congress had in mind as the American Communist-action organization referred to in Section 2. As to this there could be no doubt in view of the legislative history previously alluded to and the fact that the committee reports and the debates refer to petitioner by name.[13] Finally, while this litigation was pending in the court below, the Congress, abandoning its previous constitutional apprehensions, expressly named the petitioner as a Communist-action organization (Sec. 4, Communist Control Act).

The court below, ignoring the fact that the Congressional findings of fact basic to the ultimate decision were not left open for adjudication, held that the Act did not predetermine the Board's order because "Petitioner is not mentioned" (Op. 39).

2. The second device employed by the Act to guarantee the issuance of a registration order against petitioner consists of the evidentiary standards of Section 13(e). The function of these standards is to permit the Board to rubber-stamp the legislative finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization without proof to that effect.

By the Section 3(3) definition, a Communist-action organization is distinguished by two characteristics: (1) foreign control, and (2) advancement of the seditious objectives attributed by Section 2 to the world Communist movement. However, none of the criteria which Section 13(e) establishes for the Board's determination (and which were the only criteria applied by the Board) has any relevance whatsoever to the advancement of seditious objectives, and still less to the specific seditious objectives attributed by Section 2 to the world Communist movement.[14] This fact was conceded in the respondent's brief below, which argued that registration could be ordered even though the accused organization's policies are "good" and every act it does is "innocent" (Br. 72). The court below apparently took the same view (Op. 41, 44). Accordingly, Section 13(e) removes from administrative adjudication one of the two components of the Section 3(3) definition.

[13] The reports stated: "There is incontrovertible evidence of the fact that the Communist Party of the United States is dominated by such totalitarian dictatorship and that it is one of the principal instrumentalities used by the world Communist movement in its ruthless and timeless endeavor to advance the world march of Communism." House Rep. No. 2980, supra, pp. 1-2; Sen. Rep. No. 1358, supra, p. 5. The same passage appears in the House Committee Report on the Mundt Nixon bill. House Rep. No. 1844, 80th Cong., 2d Sess., to accompany H. R. 5852, p. 3.

As to the other component of that definition—foreign control—the situation is hardly better. The standards of 13(e) are vague and irrational criteria for a finding of foreign control. At most they supply a series of nebulous circumstantial and inferential tests which can be satisfied by relevant or irrelevant factors. For present purposes, four examples of the eight standards will suffice.

The "non-deviation" standard (Sec. 13(e)(2)) is irrational because, as the Board held (infra, pp. 30-31), it permits foreign control to be inferred from a similarity of the organization's views to those of the Soviet Union even though the views are demonstrably true, widely held by non-Communists, reasonably deducible from the facts, or independently arrived at by the organization.

The "financial aid" standard (Sec. 13(e)(3)) is satisfied merely by evidence of receipt of aid, without regard to those facts which, as the court below recognized (Op. 46), determine whether the aid is an instrument of control, i.e., the terms and conditions, if any, on which it is extended.

[14] Only the first two standards of section 13(e) have anything to do with objectives, and neither of these requires proof that the objectives referred to are seditious or evil. The court below recognized that the second standard ("non-deviation") had no relevance to the objectives element of the 3(3) definition (Op. 45).

Section 13(e)(5) makes "reporting" proof of foreign control without regard to the nature of the "report", the purpose for which it was given, or its use, if any, by the recipient. Trade unions and business, religious, scientific, cultural and political organizations customarily receive reports at their gatherings as a means of exchanging and sharing knowledge, experiences, and ideas. Under the preposterous theory of this subsection, persons who make reports at such gatherings thereby supply evidence that they and the organizations they represent are "controlled and dominated" by the organization which sponsors the gathering.

Again, Section 13(e)(6) directs the Board to consider "the extent to which" the organization's "principal leaders or a substantial number of its members are subject to or recognize the disciplinary power" of the alleged foreign principal. This standard, aside from relying on subjective attitudes, permits the condemnation of the organization upon proof of the disciplinary status of some of its leaders or members, notwithstanding that they may be an unrepresentative or dissenting minority and that the organization itself is completely independent.

The foreign-control element of the Section 3(3) definition is reasonably definite, and its application requires no subsidiary guides. Therefore, the function of Section 13(e) (in addition to eliminating adjudication of the objectives element of the definition) is to unsettle the ultimate standard by permitting it to be "proved" by irrelevant evidence.

3. In addition to predetermining the essential findings and establishing vague and irrational standards of proof, the Act establishes a Board which is necessarily under compelling pressure to decide against petitioner and whose members have a personal stake, financial and otherwise, in so deciding.

The Board is set up as a permanent agency, which originally had the sole function of identifying Communist-action organizations, their members, and Communist-front organizations. Since Communist-front organizations are by definition tools of a Communist-action organization, they can exist only if the Board finds that there is an action organization.[15]

The Act (see Sec. 2(15)) and its legislative history contemplate the existence in the United States of only one Communist-action organization, the petitioner. And even if Congress had considered that there might be more than one, it is certain that it believed petitioner to be the principle organization of that character.

It is clear, therefore, that if the Board had decided that the petitioner was not a Communist-action organization, it would have rendered itself functus officio and effectively repealed the Act. For there would be no other organization which could be charged with being a Communist-action organization, and there could be no Communist-front organization.

This circumstance has been recognized by the Board and the Attorney General. The first two chairmen of the Board informed Congressional appropriations committees that the continued functioning of the Board depended entirely upon the entry of a registration order adverse to petitioner.[16] The Attorney General instituted no proceeding under the Act against any other organization during the two years that the case against petitioner was pending before the Board. But two days after the Board issued its decision against petitioner, the Attorney General filed twelve petitions with the Board, all charging that the organizations named were Communist-front organizations and that the Communist-action organization which controls them is the petitioner herein. In the four and a half years since the Act was passed, only one organization, the petitioner, has been charged before the Board with being a Communist-action organization.

The pressure on the Board to preserve itself and the Act by deciding against petitioner was intensified by considerations of personal interest. The members of the Board had to rule against petitioner if they were to have any further business and thus keep their jobs, salaries, and the appointment patronage available to them as heads of an agency. The Board's staff, including those employees who assisted the Board in analyzing the record and preparing the decision, had a similar job interest in seeing that the order was adverse to petitioner.

B. The Proceeding Before the Board

The Act became law on September 23, 1950, and the Attorney General filed his petition with the Board on November 22, 1950 (R. 1).

The taking of evidence commenced on April 23, 1951, before a panel of three Board members (R. 1).[17] Following issuance by the panel of a recommended decision adverse to petitioner, the Board on April 20, 1953, issued its order requiring petitioner to register as a Communist-action organization (R. 138). The order was accompanied by a Report, in which the Board set forth its findings and opinion in support of the order, as required by Section 13(g) of the Act (R. 1-137).

[17] The panel was reduced to two in October, 1951, when the chairman, Charles M. LaFollette, was forced to withdraw because of adjournment of the first session of the 82nd Congress without confirmation of his appointment.

The Attorney General called twenty-two witnesses. Two of these translated or identified a few documents (R. 135-36). A third, a Columbia University professor, testified that petitioner and the Soviet Union held similar views on a number of international questions (R. 136).

The remaining nineteen witnesses had once held membership in the Communist Party. Fourteen had left or been expelled from the Party prior to the date of the Act, eight of them for periods ranging from five to twenty years before the Act (R. 134-35). None of the fourteen gave testimony as to the character or activities of the petitioner subsequent to the termination of his membership.

The testimony of the five witnesses who had remained in the Party after the date of the Act (R. 134-35) was meagre, and related almost exclusively to the period before that date. These witnesses had been rank and file members or minor officers of local units of the Party. Two of them had become virtually inactive in the Party prior to the date of the Act (R. 1034-35; Tr. 12360). Except for Harvey Matusow, all five produced little evidence on which the Board relied.

The great bulk of the documentary evidence introduced by the Attorney General consisted of Communist writings which likewise long antedated the Act. These included the Communist Manifesto of 1848, writings in the 1920's or earlier of Lenin and Stalin, and resolutions and reports of the Communist International (dissolved in 1943), of which the most recent is dated 1935. The Report contains copious quotations from and citations to these early works, but ignores contemporary writings of American Communist leaders put in evidence by petitioner as authoritative expositions of its policies, including writings whose authoritativeness was acknowledged by the Attorney General's own witness (e.g., C. P. Exs. 55, 58; R. 979-80, 983-84).

The Attorney General paraded as witnesses some of the most notorious professional informers on the current scene.[18] The testimony of several of these witnesses had been rejected as false in previous proceedings.[19] One of the Attorney General's witnesses had earlier admitted perjuring himself in prior appearances as an anti-Communist witness and declared his readiness to continue doing so.[20] Unimpeached documentary evidence established that many of these witnesses perjured themselves in the proceeding before the Board.[21] Subsequent to the hearing, one of the Attorney General's witnesses has admitted a series of perjuries.[22] Two others have been shown to be so unreliable that even the Department of Justice has stopped using them as witnesses.[23] Still others have thoroughly discredited themselves.[24]

The case of the petitioner was presented through three witnesses. Two of these (Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and John Gates) have for many years been members of the petitioner's national committee, its highest governing body in the intervals between national conventions.[25] The third witness, Dr. Herbert Aptheker, a member of the Communist Party, and a distinguished historian and author, testified as an expert on Marxism-Leninism (R. 136).

The testimony of these witnesses and the documentary evidence introduced through them, present a detailed portrayal of petitioner's purposes, views, policies and activities as they exist currently and from the time of petitioner's reconstitution as a political party in 1945 (R. 1199-1241, 1257-97).

The Report either rejects or ignores all of the oral and documentary evidence presented by petitioner, although much of it was uncontradicted. It goes to fanciful lengths to disparage the credibility of Gates and Aptheker (R. 17-18, 38-39). It makes no adverse comment on any of the Attorney General's witnesses.

C. The Evidence and the Findings

The Board's findings are subsumed in its Report under nine sections. In the first, the Board found "that there exists a world Communist movement, substantially as described in Section 2 of the Act" (R. 9). In the other eight sections, the Board made findings adverse to petitioner under each of the eight standards of Section 13(e). The Board based its ultimate conclusion on the totality of these findings. It did not suggest what its conclusion would have been had it made a finding favorable to petitioner under any of the standards of Section 13(e).

The court below held that the Board's findings under the "reporting" and "secret practices" standards (13(e)(5) and (7)) were not supported by a preponderance of the evidence. Accordingly, it "struck" these two findings (Op. 72-74). Nevertheless, the court affirmed the Board's order instead of remanding the case for decision anew on the basis of the surviving findings.

The issue before the Board was the current character of the petitioner, i.e., whether it was a Communist-action organization, as defined by the Act, at the time of the proceeding.[26] The Report, though acknowledging this fact (R. 130), ranges over the entire thirty-three years of petitioner's history, indiscriminately commingling discussion of alleged contemporary practices and alleged episodes of the remote past. The great bulk of the evidence on which the Report relies relates to the period when the petitioner was affiliated with the Communist International. The undisputed facts are that petitioner severed its affiliation with the Communist International in 1940, in order to avoid the registration requirements of the then newly enacted Voorhis Act, and that the Communist International itself dissolved in 1943 (R. 14-15).[27] It is also undisputed, and was acknowledged by the court below (Op. 65), that petitioner has had no foreign affiliation since 1940.[28]

[26] Sections 13(g) and (h) of the Act require the Board to determine whether an accused organization "is" or "is not" a Communist-action organization. Likewise, the definition of a Communist-action organization (sec. 3(3)) and the evidentiary criteria (sec. 13(e)) are all phrased in the present tense.

The Board acknowledged that there was no post-Act evidence under two of the standards of Section 13(e). As to "instruction and training" (13(e)(4)), the Report admits that "there is no substantial evidence of record showing training of [petitioner's] members in the Soviet Union subsequent to the outbreak of World War II" (R. 92). In fact, none of the instances of alleged training abroad cited in the Report post-date 1936 (R. 90). As to "financial aid" (Sec. 13(e)(3)), the Report finds that after petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International in 1940, "evidence of such financial aid does not appear in the record with one exception." The "exception" consisted of the Board's misrepresentation of testimony by Harvey Matusow (R. 88).[29]

[27] The report states that the 1940 disaffiliation did not alter the relationship betwen the petitioner and the Communist International (R. 6). This conclusion is without foundation and was not accepted by the Court below (Op. 64-65). The evidence is undisputed that the petitioner had no communications or dealings with the Communist International after the disaffiliation (R. 1286). Nor is there any suggestion that the Communist International survived its dissolution in 1943.

[28] The uncontradicted evidence is that petitioner is not, and never was, affiliated with the Communist Information Bureau, and has had no dealings or relations with it (R. 1209-10, 1280-82, 1288; Tr. 15037-38). As the evidence cited by the Report shows, the Bureau is an organization of the Communist Parties of eight European countries for "mutual consultation and voluntary coordination of action" among the member parties (R. 7).

[29] Matusow testified that in 1949 the head of International Publishers told him that the company had, at some undisclosed time in the past, received from the Soviet Union without charge book plates, English translations of books, and page proofs (R. 1036-37). There was no testimony that the petitioner ever benefited from this alleged transaction, and, in fact, the Report itself elsewhere refers to International Publishers as a Soviet organization (R. 87). Matusow has admitted that this testimony was perjurious. False Witness (1955).

Though acknowledging that there was no post-Act evidence of either instruction and training or financial aid, the Board nevertheless made findings adverse to petitioner on both subjects (R. 88-89, 93). It then used these findings to support its ultimate determination as to petitioner's current character, and its action was affirmed by the court below (Op. 71-72).

The only post-Act matters cited by the Board to support its findings on the four other standards of Section 13(e) which were sustained by the court below ("directives and policies," "non-deviation," "discipline" and "allegiance") are: (1) obviously irrelevant episodes (e.g., that the Daily Worker stations a correspondent in, and prints dispatches from, Moscow (R. 62-63); (2) that petitioner is an avowed adherent of the principles of Marxism-Leninism; and (3) that petitioner publicly opposes the cold-war policy of the national administration and has taken the same position as the Soviet Union on certain international questions (R. 9-86, 98-104, 118-28).[30] pp. 101-02. It is illuminating to note that the finding as to the next-preceding alleged transaction was based on testimony of Budenz that in 1940 the Daily Worker and Intercontinent News received news dispatches from a Soviet news agency without cost (R. 88). Documentary evidence demonstrated that Budenz' testimony was false (C. P. Exs. 70-75; R. 1191-94). There is no credible evidence contradicting the testimony of petitioner's witnesses Flynn and Gates that petitioner did not receive any foreign financial aid during their tenure as national committee members, commencing in 1938 and 1945, respectively (R. 1213-15, 1290-91).

[30] In the court below, the Board virtually conceded that the only post-Act evidence supporting its order is petitioner's adherence to Marxism-Leninism and the similarity of its views to those of the Soviet Union. It stated (Respondent's brief, 118): "Petitioner admits that the 'post-Act evidence' shows it to be an American adherent of Marxism-Leninism and that it consistently takes the same position as the Soviet Union. It does not deny the evidence of its non-deviation from Soviet policies and its present secret practices. When these admitted current facts are judged, as they must be, in the light of the evidence of record as to what Marxism-Leninism and non-deviation involve, it is clear that they support the finding that petitioner not only was, but presently is, a Communist-action organization as defined by the Act."

The Board's finding on "reporting" (Sec. 13(e)(5)), stricken by the court below, was in the present tense, though the Report cites nothing after the date of the Act which it characterizes as reporting even under a palpably absurd conception of that term (R. 93-98). There was post-Act evidence relating to "secret practices" (Sec. 13(e)(7)), but, as the court below held in striking the Board's finding, there was no evidence that these practices were engaged in for purposes made relevant by the Act (Op. 73-74). On the contrary, the uncontradicted evidence of both sides was that petitioner's utilization of such practices was a precaution against persecution (R. 1216-23, 919, 1025-26).

The court below affirmed the ultimate finding of the Board primarily on the basis of six factors which it considered determinative (Op. 61-70). The only post-Act evidence supporting these factors are items indicating that petitioner adheres to the ultimate objective of Communism, referred to by the court as "a classless, stateless world," and that petitioner advocates various international policies which are similar to those of the Soviet Union (see infra, p. 33).

Accordingly, the real evidentiary basis for the Board's order is petitioner's adherence to the principles of Communism and its views on international questions. This fact also appears from the major features of the Board's treatment of the four standards for which the Report claims the existence of post-Act evidence and which the court below allowed to stand.

Directives and policies. The Board found, under Section 13(e)(1), that petitioner formulates and carries out its policies pursuant to directives from and to effectuate the policies of the Soviet Union (R. 79). In reaching this conclusion, the Board first found that prior to petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International in 1940, decisions and resolutions of that body were "directives" to petitioner (R. 10-11). The Board cites no evidence that subsequent to 1940 petitioner received foreign directives in any legitimate meaning of the term. Moreover, petitioner's witnesses, Gates and Flynn, testified, without contradiction, that during their tenure as members of petitioner's national committee, petitioner has received no foreign directives of any kind, but has formulated and carried out its policies pursuant to its independent judgment as to the needs and interests of the American people (R. 1211, 1227, 1288-89).

The Board, however, concluded from its reading of various Communist writings, commencing with the Communist Manifesto of 1848, that this body of doctrine constitutes on its face a series of "directives" issued by the Soviet Union and binding upon petitioner [31] (R. 78). The Board found from its reading of the texts that "the [Marxist] classics are one of the chief means by which the C. P. S. U. directs and controls the C. P. U. S. A." (R. 43). The court below applied the same theory, sustaining the Board's order primarily on the grounds that "Marxism-Leninism is basic to the Party" and that petitioner "presents no evidence of a repudiation of world Communist doctrines" (Op. 70).[32]

Non-Deviation. The Board found under Section 13(e)(2) that petitioner's "views and policies do not deviate from those of the Soviet Union" (R. 86).

[31] Of course, much of the literature from which the Board draws this conclusion was written long before there was a Soviet Union. Furthermore, the doctrine had American adherents more than half a century before the Russian revolution or the formation of a Communist Party in America (R. 1262-5, 1270-1).

[32] The court stated (Op. 66) that "while the tenets of Marxism-Leninism * * * permit a wide flexibility in tactics, that is, of intermediate activities, they admit of no deviation from the ultimate objective, which is a classless, stateless world." The Report characterizes Marxism-Leninism as an "amorphous amalgam" (R. 42). It states that Marxist-Leninist principles have "been provided an elasticity which makes them applicable under an endless variety of circumstances," and that the "overall policy of Marxism-Leninism" is to do "what is expedient under the given circumstances" (R. 31, 21). Thus, the "directives" of Marxism-Leninism come down to an instruction to achieve "a classless, stateless world."

The Board's finding was based primarily on testimony that the petitioner and the Soviet Union, as shown by their public statements, held similar or "parallel" views on each of 44 different questions relating to international affairs, ranging from the League of Nations in 1919 to the Korean war in 1950 (R. 80, 82-84).

In making its finding on "non-deviation," the Board applied the following principles:

1. That it was irrelevant whether or not the Soviet Union adopted its view on a given subject before petitioner adopted its view. The Attorney General stated that "we have not made any attempt to show how the Communist Party reached the views that it did" (R. 836). He offered no evidence that the Soviet view was adopted or communicated prior to petitioner's expression of its view on the same subject. In affirming the Board's finding, the court below held that the date sequence of the views was irrelevant, stating, "The statutory phrase ['do not deviate from'] refers to identity or coincidence and not to chronological adoption" (Op. 89).

2. That it was irrelevant whether the views were true, reasonable or generally accepted by non-Communists, including, in some instances, the government of the United States. The Board accepted the Attorney General's position (Tr. 8878) that "it does not matter whether the Soviet view on these issues which were raised were [sic] right or wrong, or whether the Soviet view was held by many people, by some people, or by all the people." Accordingly, it sustained the action of the hearing panel in excluding evidence offered by petitioner to show the truth, reasonableness and general acceptance of the views (R. 81).[33]

[33] These rulings were applied to the following views, among others: that there should be negotiations for a cease-fire in Korea (R. 8647); that the Chiang Kai-shek regime was a corrupt dictatorship (R. 836-37); that the establishment of a second front in World War II was desirable (R. 844-45); that the League of Nations as originally organ-

3. That it was irrelevant that petitioner arrived at its views independently, and that the similarity of the views of petitioner and the Soviet Union resulted from an independent application by each of the premises and analytical approach of Marxist-Leninist principles. Evidence to this effect was excluded by the hearing panel. The Board affirmed the panel's rulings. Yet its Report asserts that the "great weight of the evidence is contrary" to the proposition which petitioner was precluded from proving [34] (R. 842-44, 80, 86).

4. That it was irrelevant that the views were calculated to promote the peace and well-being of the United States, or even that the United States government officially adopted them (R. 81).[35] The Attorney General made no attempt to show that any of the views testified to were dangerous, seditious, or opposed to the national interests of the United States. He took the position that these matters were "wholly irrelevant" (Tr. 9059). In agreement with that position, the hearing panel excluded evidence offered by petitioner to show that the views in question were in the national interest, and the Board affirmed its ruling (R. 839, 844, 861, 864, 81).

Petitioner's witnesses testified, without contradiction, that petitioner's views and policies are established by it ized promoted imperialist purposes (R. 839; Tr. 9063); that the defendants in the 1937 Soviet treason trials were guilty as charged (R. 840); that Oatis' confession of espionage was true (R. 845); that the Syngman Rhee government was a corrupt police state (R. 862-64). Citations are to exclusions on cross-examination. For renewal of the rulings to exclude the proof in petitioner's affirmative case, see R. 1274-75.

[34] This too though the Attorney General's expert witness, on whose testimony the "non-deviation" finding is based, testified that he was unable to conclude that the petitioner's views were not arrived at independently (R. 837-38).

[35] E.g., the views that a second front in World War II was desirable and that a cease-fire in Korea should be negotiated (R. 844-45, 864).

in the exercise of its own best judgment and in the application of the principles of scientific socialism to current conditions. They further testified that the similarity of petitioner's views on international questions to those of the Communist Parties of other countries, including the Soviet Union, is only natural because all Communists share the same scientific approach and are guided by the needs of the working people, who in all lands have a common interest in promoting international friendship, cooperation and world peace (R. 1224-27, 1283-84). Also uncontradicted was petitioner's testimony that it has often taken positions in advance of the Soviet Union and has taken positions on many questions as to which the Soviet Union has never expressed a view (R. 1227).

Discipline. The Board found that petitioner recognizes and is subject to the disciplinary power of the Soviet Union (R. 104; Op. 72-73).

To support this finding, the Report cites four instances in which members of petitioner were allegedly expelled or otherwise disciplined on the initiative of the Communist International during the period of petitioner's affiliation with that organization (R. 102). The most recent of these cases occurred in 1934. The Report and the court below cite four other disciplinary cases (R. 102-03; Op. 73). These were: petitioner's expulsion of Johnson in 1940 for opportunism; its expulsion of Lautner in 1950 on the charge that he was a police spy; its expulsion of Tomkins in 1951 for distributing anti-Soviet leaflets; its demotion of Browder in 1945 for abandoning Marxist-Leninist principles, and its expulsion of him in 1946 for conducting a factional fight against the decisions of petitioner's national convention. Neither the Board nor the court below suggested that the Soviet Union had anything to do with these cases of internal discipline, and no such suggestion could find support in the record.

Both the Board and the court relied heavily on petitioner's practice of "democratic centralism" to support the finding on foreign discipline (R. 103-04, 56-57; Op. 72). The Board found that "democratic centralism" is a Marxist-Leninist principle of organization which requires the election of all officers and leading committees; full discussion of all policy questions before a decision is taken by the appropriate body; unqualified acceptance by the minority of majority decisions, and the execution of such decisions by the entire membership (R. 56). The Board found that prior to 1940 adherence to the principle of democratic centralism obliged petitioner to accept decisions of the Communist International to which it was affiliated (R. 57). However, subsequent to petitioner's 1940 disaffiliation from the Communist International, which dissolved in 1943, there has been no international organization whose decisions are binding on petitioner, and the Board makes no finding to the contrary. Hence, at least since 1940, petitioner's practice of democratic centralism relates solely to internal management. As the Attorney General's own witness, Lautner, testified, democratic centralism "pertains to rules and regulations by which the Communist Party governs itself" (R. 965).

The petitioner's witnesses testified, without contradiction, that petitioner's leaders and members are not subject to and do not recognize the disciplinary power of any foreign government or organization (R. 1223-24).

Allegiance. The Board found under Section 13(e)(8) that petitioner's "leaders and its members consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their loyalty and obligations to the Soviet Union" (R. 128). This finding is based pimarily on the Board's view (R. 118-23) of Communist theory as developed in the works which were examined by this Court in Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, and from which this Court concluded that belief in Communist doctrine was not incompatible with attachment to the principles of the Constitution and being well disposed to the good order and happiness of the United States.

Petitioner's witnesses testified that petitioner's leaders and members owe allegiance only to the United States and its people, and that they do not consider their allegiance to this country subordinate to any obligations (of which they have none) to any foreign government or foreign organization. They repudiated the Board's version of Marxism-Leninism. Their testimony was documented by evidence of writings distributed by petitioner opposing doctrines of forcible overthrow of the government and affirming the allegiance of Communists to the United States (R. 1235-41, 1282-83; C. P. Ex. 55, p. 3; C. P. Ex. 56, p. 3).

Facts Relied on by the Court. The court below sustained the ultimate finding of the Board primarily on the basis of six factors which it characterized as "underlying basic facts" that "are heavy in the scales" and "determine the final answer" (Op. 61). These factors were:

(1) The fact that petitioner "presents no evidence of a repudiation of world Communist doctrines" subsequent to its disaffiliation from the Communist International in 1940 (Op. 70).

(2) The fact that petitioner calls itself the Communist Party of the United States. The court explained that "it is difficult for us to see why the Party would call itself the Communist Party of the U. S. A. if it were not in fact a part of the Communist movement in theory and program" (Op. 65).

(3) The fact that the reconstitution of the Communist Party in 1945 resulted from what was considered to be a prior departure from the principles of Marxism-Leninism (Op. 65-66).

(4) The fact that petitioner adheres to the "ultimate objective" of Marxism-Leninism, "a classless, stateless world" (Op. 66).

(5) The fact that "the Party's press follows closely world Communist views" (Op. 70).

(6) The fact that petitioner's views on a series of international questions (see supra, p. 29) were similar to the views of the Soviet Union (Op. 68-69).

The court below did not find that any of these factors involve the advocacy of violent or unconstitutional means for the attainment of petitioner's immediate or ultimate objectives. It noted the testimony of petitioner's principal witness that petitioner advocates a peaceful and constitutional transition to socialism in this country (Op. 67). It acknowledged that it is "the established position of Communist leaders that American democracy has gone far in protecting the rights of minorities and of working people and in advancing the economic status of such people, and that in that respect American democracy receives the plaudits of those leaders" (ibid.). The court, however, considered this position irrelevant, on the ground that it "in no way negates the ultimate stateless world objective of the world Communist movement" (ibid.).

World Communist Movement. As we have seen (supra, p. 15), the court below held that the findings of Section 2 of the Act with reference to the existence and nature of a world Communist movement were conclusive upon the Board and the courts. Nevertheless it reviewed and sustained the finding of the Board that on the evidence, "there exists a world Communist movement substantially as described in section 2 of the Act" (R. 9; Op. 61).

The court's conclusion was based (Op. 56-60) on its reading of the Communist Manifesto; Stalin's Problems of Leninism and Foundations of Leninism;[36] the Theses and Statutes adopted by the Communist International in 1920; and the Programme of the Communist International, adopted at the Sixth Congress of that organization in 1928 and superseded by the resolutions of the Seventh Congress in 1935 (A. G. Exs. 125 and 137). From these works the court below found that there is a world Communist movement having the following characteristics: (1) The movement has as its ultimate objective "a classless, stateless society ruled by the proletariat of the world."[37] (2) "The basic concepts of this ultimate objective are that the sole value is labor and that capitalism and nationalism are merely means for exploiting the masses of workers." (3) the program of the movement "calls for a small hard core of revolutionaries, formed into a disciplined Party in every country," which is to attain control of the government in order to destroy its present form and ultimately weld it into the stateless world society. (5) In the interim period, the Soviet Union, being the first and so far biggest government under Communist control, "must be protected and preserved as Communistic at any cost" (Op. 60-61).

[36] The American editions of these works of Stalin which were introduced were published in 1934 and 1932, respectively. They were written in 1926 and 1924, respectively. A. G. Exs. 138, 121A.

Accordingly, the court below found that there is a world Communist movement in the sense that there are Communist parties in various countries which base their program and activities on a common economic and political outlook, and work toward the ultimate achievement of a common goal —a universal, classless, stateless society.

The movement found by the court below is palpably not the world Communist movement postulated in Sections 2, 3(3) and 13(e) of the Act. The movement postulated by the Act is characterized by the presence of a highly centralized organization, rigid control by a foreign government, and the use of violent and criminal means. Thus subsections (1), (5) and (8) of Section 2 describe the movement as operating "through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization" of which the Communist parties of the various countries are "sections" and "affiliated constituent elements." Subsections (4) and (5) of Section 2 find that the control of the world Communist movement is vested in "the Communist dictatorship of a foreign country" through the medium of "action organizations" which are "sections of a world-wide Communist organization." And subsections (1) and (11) of Section 2 find that the world Communist movement employs espionage, sabotage, terrorism and treachery.

Neither the court below nor the Board found, or could have found from the evidence, the existence of a movement having these characteristics. The only organization which was "a world-wide Communist organization" was the Communist International. But, as the court concedes, the Communist International was dissolved in 1943 and has not been succeeded by any similar organization.[38]

In the absence of such an organization, there could be no foreign control of the movement "through the medium" of the organization. Furthermore, the court below did not find that the movement which it described is controlled by the Soviet Union. Finally, the record is devoid of evidence of the means employed by the Communist parties of other counties to achieve their objectives. It is equally devoid of evidence that petitioner has committed or advocated acts of terror, sabotage or espionage, and indeed the court below held that no such evidence is required by the Act (supra, p. 17).

[38] The Communist Information Bureau, referred to by the court below (Op. 60), is not, and was not found to be, the organization described in section 2. Its membership is not world-wide, but is confined to the Communist parties of eight European countries (R. 17; 1592). It is not a centralized organization, but, as the Board's report states and a witness for the Attorney General testified, its purpose is to provide a medium for "mutual consultation and voluntary coordination of action" among the member parties (R. 7; 937-38; 971). Moreover, the court below acknowledges (Op. 65) that petitioner is not affiliated with the Communist Information Bureau, and the uncontradicted evidence shows that petitioner has never had dealings with it (R. 1205-10; 1286-89).

The petitioner's witnesses testified that there is no "world Communist movement" as described in Section 2. According to their testimony, a world Communist movement exists today only in the sense that there are Communist Parties in most nations, all of which are independent of one another, but which share a common working-class science and world outlook, and work for the eventual establishment of socialism in their respective countries by the free choice of a majority of the people of each country (Tr. 15137-40, 15229-30, 15950, 15137-39).

Petitioner denied that it was a Communist-action organization. It described itself as "a political party of the American working class, basing itself on the principles of scientific socialism-Marxism Leninism" (A. G. Ex. 374; R. 1695). While its ultimate objective, as stated in its constitution, is "the establishment of socialism by the free choice of a majority of the American people" (A. G. Ex. 374), it is petitioner's view that the issue now before the American people is not between socialism and capitalism, but between peace and war, democracy and fascism (R. 1229; A. G. Ex. 378, p. 1; C. P. Ex. 55, pp. 8, 10, 30-31). According to petitioner's witnesses, its immediate objectives are to promote the interests of American labor and the people under capitalism by organizing and uniting them for action to win demands which are realizable under capitalism. These include maintaining peace, preserving and extending civil liberties, improving the economic conditions of the workers and eliminating racial and religious discrimination. (R. 1201-02).

D. Extra-Legal Pressures on the Board and Manifestations of Bias

1. The President named the five original members of the Board by so-called recess appointments on October 23, 1950. He submitted their nominations to the Senate on November 27, 1950 and again on February 12, 1951 (First Annual Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5). However, the Senate Judiciary Committee under the chairmanship of Senator McCarran, one of the fathers of the Act, took no action on these nominations until July 30, 1951. It then reported favorably on three of the appointees, but took no action on Charles M. LaFollette, chairman of the hearing panel and acting chairman of the Board.[39] The three nominees reported on favorably were confirmed by the Senate ten days later (Second Annual Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5). The LaFollette nomination died in committee with the adjournment of the Eighty-Second Congress on October 20, 1951, at which time Mr. LaFollette ceased to serve (J. A. 1).

Accordingly, for many months during the pendency of this proceeding,[40] the jobs of the Board members were subject to the pleasure of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which had stated, in its report on the bill which became the Act, that "there is incontrovertible evidence of the fact that the Communist Party of the United States" is a Communist-action organization.[41]

During the hearing, it developed that witnesses of the Attorney General were reporting on the conduct of the proceeding by the panel to a staff member of Senator McCarran's committee. The panel chairman reacted to this surveillance as follows:

[39] The fifth original member of the Board and its first chairman, Mr. Seth W. Richardson, resigned on June 6, 1951, because of his health (First Annual Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5).

[40] The petition was filed on November 22, 1950, and after pre-hearing motions were disposed of, the panel began to hear testimony on April 23, 1951 (J. A. 1).

> "Mr. LaFollette: So that my own thinking may be clear for everybody to know, I feel pretty much the same way about this witness discussing my conduct in the hearing room with Mr. Mandel, under the circumstances, as I would if I were a nisi prius judge in an elective office, and a political boss had the right to control my nomination or renomination" (R. 297).

2. During the course of the hearing, Board and panel member McHale made a speech before the Women's National Democratic Club in which she discussed the proceeding at some length. She referred to one of the issues of fact which had arisen in connection with the "non-deviation" criterion and to the character of the world Communist movement; and expressed a prejudgment on both (R. 193-6, 187-190). She clearly indicated her view that the hearing was merely a formality by likening the petitioner to the rabbit in the aphorism, "As an old recipe for rabbit stew goes, we must first catch the rabbit" (R. 196).

Immediately after the issuance of the panel's recommended decision and while the proceeding was pending on review before the full Board, chairman and panel member Brown, together with the Board's general counsel, appeared on a radio and television forum sponsored by Georgetown University and devoted to a discussion of this case from an anti-Communist point of view. The chairman and the general counsel commented on the evidence, expressed self-gratulatory delight with the recommended decision, and stated their conviction that petitioner is a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act. In referring to the Act's definition of Communist-front organizations, the chairman stated that they are organizations controlled by the Communist Party, thereby demonstrating his awareness of and agreement with the Act's prejudgment (R. 197-98, 206-08).

The conduct of Brown and McHale was made the subject of affidavits of bias and prejudice, filed under Section 7(a) of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U. S. C. 1006(a), made applicable to the proceeding by Section 6 of the Act (R. 187-90, 196-99). The Board refused to disqualify them (R. 190, 209).

E. Petitioner's Motion to Adduce Additional Evidence

While this proceeding was pending before the lower court, petitioner moved pursuant to Section 14 of the Act for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board.[42] The motion and supporting affidavit in substance stated and offered to prove that subsequent to the conclusion of the proceeding before the Board, two of the Attorney General's principal witnesses, Crouch and Johnson, committed perjury in other proceedings[43] and that a third, Matusow, admitted a course of perjury[44] (R. 2053-68). The moving papers further stated that because of the public disclosure of the perjury of these three informers, the Attorney General had ceased to employ them as witnesses[45] (R. 2063-65).

Petitioner's motion and affidavit further showed from an analysis of the Report that in numerous instances the Board had rested material findings of fact adverse to petitioner

[43] Johnson before the International Organizations Loyalty Board in a proceeding with respect to Dr. Ralph J. Bunche; Crouch, in U. S. v. Kuzma, a Smith Act conspiracy prosecution in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania and in Matter of Jacob Burck, a deportation proceeding (R. 2061-64).

[44] These admissions were made to Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam and to Messrs. Russell Brown and Robert Norvell, law associates of former Attorney General J. Howard McGrath (R. 2064-65).

[45] As petitioner's affidavit also shows, the cross-examination of these three informers in their appearances before the Board had developed a pattern of false testimony both in this proceeding and, in the case of Crouch and Johnson, in prior proceedings (R. 2059-60).

in whole or in part on the testimony of these three witnesses (R. 2056-57, 2067-68).[46]

Respondent filed no counter-affidavit, but urged that petitioner's motion should be denied for lack of a showing that a hearing of the additional evidence would probably change the result—i.e. persuade the Board to find for petitioner (R. 2069-79). The court below denied petitioner's motion without opinion, Judge Bazelon not participating (R. 2082).

Subsequent to the court's action and its decision in this case, Matusow, by affidavits and from the witness stand, has recanted as perjurious his testimony in two other proceedings (U. S. v. Jencks, U. S. D. C. W. D. Tex.; U. S. v. Flynn et al., D. C. S. D. N. Y. ).[47] In addition, Matusow has written and published a book, False Witness, in which he details numerous instances in which he gave false testimony under oath, including (pp. 101-02) his testimony before the Board in this proceeding. Finally, the Board recently ruled that it would disregard all of the testimony of Matusow in another proceeding before it because of the admissions made by him to Bishop Oxnam and Brown. Report of the Board, Brownell v. Labor Youth League, No. 102-53, pp. 4-5.

[46] The Board's annotated version of the Report (R. 1799-2052) reveals that the Board supported its findings of fact with 36 separate references to the testimony of Crouch, 25 to the testimony of Johnson and 24 to the testimony of Matusow (R. 2067-68). To cite but four examples: Matusow's is the only testimony relied on by the Board to support its findings that petitioner advocated the violent overthrow of the government in the post-Act period and that it received foreign financial aid subsequent to 1940 (R. 2020, 1962). The Board's key finding that petitioner's 1940 disaffiliation from the Communist International was spurious is based on the testimony of Crouch (R. 1826, 1811, 2036). And the Board relied heavily on the testimony of Johnson for its findings with reference to the authority over petitioner exercised by alleged representatives of the Communist International (R. 1909, 1972, 2028, 2030).

[47] After a hearing in the Jencks case, the District Court denied a motion for a new trial based upon Matusow's perjurious testimony. The court in the Flynn case has taken a similar motion under advisement upon the conclusion of a hearing.

REASONS FOR ALLOWING THE WRIT

I. The Board's order, if allowed to stand, will have immediate and far-reaching consequences of the greatest public importance.

A. If the Board's order becomes final, it will immediately outlaw the Communist Party, proscribe all of its advocacy, prevent it from engaging in lawful political activity, and subject its members to intolerable sanctions. It will lay the foundation for mass prosecutions of members for failure to comply with the impossible requirement that they publicly declare that they are criminal conspirators and expose themselves to the Act's sanctions. For all practical purposes, a final order will make membership in the Communist Party a crime.

This is the first time in our history that the Communist Party or any other political party has been outlawed by federal legislation. Yet Marxist groups and parties have been active in this country as lawful political organizations since the middle of the last century,[48] and the Communist Party has been a legal political party since its inception. Although always numerically small, it has run numerous candidates for public office, some of whom were elected, has participated in coalitions to elect non-Communist candidates, and has engaged in other political and economic activity within the tradition of American working class and socialist parties which preceded it.

[48] American Marxists helped in the formation of the Republican Party, backed Lincoln's candidacy in 1860, made significant contributions to the cause of the federal government in the Civil War, helped form the first national federation of American trade unions, and played a leading role in organizing the American Federation of Labor. See R. 1262-65, 1270-71; Gompers, Seventy Years of Life and Labor (N. Y. 1925), v. 1, pp. 51-60. Marx once observed, "Socialism and Communism did not originate in Germany, but in England, France and North America." Selected Works (N. Y. 1926), p. 140.

Even the worst enemies of the Communist Party must admit that it has frequently played a seminal role in bringing about needed changes in our social and economic life. Many of the reforms advanced by the Communist Party, and originally the object of vilification, have been adopted by the people of the United States, when they were convinced, with the aid of Communist agitation, that these were to their best interest. To name only a few: social security, minimum wage legislation, the organization of labor unions on industrial lines, and measures against racial discrimination.

No other Western democracy outlaws the Communist Party.[49] Only the United States, the most powerful capitalist nation, which proclaims leadership of the free world, asserts that such a measure is necessary for its safety and compatible with a democratic society. Yet Mr. Justice Douglas has observed that America's "growing tendency in the interests of security to take short cuts, to disregard the rights of the individual, to sponsor the cause of intolerance, and to adopt more and more the tactics of the world forces we oppose . . . have helped lose for America the commanding position of moral leadership which we had at the end of World War II." [50]

B. A final order of the Board will supply the foundation for governmental proscription of many organizations in addition to the petitioner and for the imposition of the Act's sanctions against their members. The Board has already ordered one organization to register as a "Communist-front," and proceedings are now pending against twelve other organizations on the same charge. These organizations include two schools for social studies and groups promoting such causes as civil liberties, the interests of the foreign born, economic security for the aged, etc.[51]

[49] Legislation to outlaw the Communist party of Australia was held unconstitutional by the High Court. Australian Communist Party v. The Commonwealth, 83 C. L. R. 1.

[50] Address to the American Law Institute, New Republic, Nov. 16, 1953.

The number of front organizations can, and undoubtedly will, be multiplied almost indefinitely in the light of the comprehensive criteria of section 13(f).[52] And the sweep of the Act has been recently extended by the creation of a new category, "Communist-infiltrated" organizations, under which the Attorney General will, as he has indicated, institute proceedings against a number of trade unions.[53] Moreover, if the present categories of front and infiltrated organizations turn out to be too restricted, new ones can, and undoubtedly will, be created. Having moved from action and front organizations to infiltrated organizations, the Act could next be extended to groups which are "contaminated," "tainted," "tinged," and finally, "politically unreliable."

If the Constitution can be held to authorize the premises which underlie the proscription of petitioner, there remains little room for constitutional objections to the application of the Act to all of these other organizations.

[51] The names of these organizations give some indication of the diverse nature of their activities: Civil Rights Congress, American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born, Jefferson School of Social Science, Labor Youth League, Council on African Affairs, Washington Pension Union, Council for American-Soviet Friendship, Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, American Slav Congress, United May Day Committee, California Labor School.

[52] An illustration of these criteria in operation is supplied by the following typical allegation made by the Attorney General in a petition to require an organization to register as a front: "The Committee supported the views, policies and objectives of the Communist Party by opposing the enactment of certain legislation regarded by the Party as inimical to its interests such as the Mundt-Nixon Bill, the Hobbs Bill, and the Internal Security Act of 1950." Paragraph III(4)(c) of Amended Petition in Brownell v. American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, Docket No. 109-53, Subversive Activities Control Board.

Moreover, the techniques and interpretations of the Act used against petitioner by the Board and the court below, will, if allowed to stand, be applied in cases involving other organizations so as to destroy virtually any group whose views are not governmentally approved.

C. If the order of the Board becomes final, the civil and criminal penalties which the Act imposes on individuals for membership in petitioner will be extended far beyond those who are its members by any conventional or rational standards. The all-embracing criteria of membership contained in section 5 of the Communist Control Act will jeopardize the liberty of countless non-Communists, including all those who are now "security risks."[54] Such persons as Oppenheimer, Vincent, Davies, Ladejinsky, Condon, Lattimore, Peters, and many thousands of lesser prominence, will be natural targets of the civil disabilities imposed by the Act on "members" of petitioner and of prosecution for failure to register. The Court should not wait until the axe has fallen on some of these victims before determining whether it may be constitutionally wielded.

D. If the Act and the order of the Board are allowed to stand, traditional American liberties, already severely restricted, can scarcely survive. As President Truman declared in vetoing the bill which became the Act (H.R. Doc. No. 708, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 6-7):

> "Obviously, if this law were on the statute books, the part of prudence would be to avoid saying anything that might be construed by someone as not deviating

[54] See supra, p. 7. Commenting on section 5, the Newark Ledger stated: "Such a law might be used to herd into prison thousands of persons who have never been Communists and who have no basic sympathy with the Communist conspiracy." 100 Cong. Rec. 14399. The Wall Street Journal said: "One of these provisions is that it would be evidence of cooperation with the Communist groups if any person has indicated a willingness to carry out aims and purposes of the party. For all we know the Communist Party may be against juvenile delinquency. So is this newspaper." Id. at 14400 > sufficiently from the current Communist-propaganda line. And since no one could be sure in advance what views were safe to express, the inevitable tendency would be to express no views of controversial subjects."

For this reason, the President declared that the registration provisions of the legislation "represent a clear and present danger to our institutions" (Id., p. 5). On this and related grounds, passage of the Act was opposed by numerous trade unions, religious and community organizations, more than twenty major newspapers, and many prominent lawyers and laymen.[55]

This proceeding immediately involves the rights of Communists. But events of recent years have once more proved that repression cannot be contained. What began as a drive against Communists has inexorably led to the victimization of thousands of non-Communists, who have been prosecuted, dismissed from their jobs, blacklisted, ostracized, barred from public platforms, deported, denied the right to leave or enter the country, and otherwise persecuted. Of even more moment have been the pervasive restraints on expression, the burning of books, and the creation of "the ministry of fear in our country."[56]

[56] Averill Harriman, quoted in N. Y. Post, May 5, 1953.

When the court below sustained the Act and the Board's order, it upheld the premises of McCarthyism on which they are based. These are coerced conformity, suppression of peaceable assembly and advocacy, determination of guilt by legislative fiat, imputation of guilt by association, trial by a biased tribunal, judgment on the basis of irrational and vague standards, and acceptance of the testimony of professional perjurers. If these execrable policies may lawfully be applied to petitioner, they may be, and inevitably will be, extended to the people as a whole. Indeed, the techniques which the Act and the Board employed against the petitioner have only recently been used to indict four Democratic administrations and the present Republican administration for "twenty-two years of treason," to impugn the loyalty of two former presidents, and to impeach the integrity of the foreign service and the armed forces.

The issue which this case presents is not whether Communism will survive in America, but whether the Constitution will survive to protect the whole American people.

II. This proceeding presents fundamental constitutional questions which have not been, but should be settled by this Court or which were decided by the court below in a way in conflict with the applicable decisions of this Court.

A. Whether the Act violates due process or is a bill of attainder because it predetermines, by legislative fiat, facts essential to the ultimate determination that petitioner is a "Communist-action" organization.

Since the order of the Board deprives petitioner and its members of liberty and property, it may not be entered without a hearing. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123; Morgan v. United States, 304 U. S. 1. If any of the elements requisite to a finding that petitioner is a "Communist-action" organization have been determined adversely to petitioner by legislative fiat rather than by a free adjudication of the facts, the due process requirement of a hearing has been violated. Manley v. Georgia, 279 U. S. 1; Western and Atlantic Railroad v. Henderson, 279 U. S. 639; McFarland v. American Sugar Refining Co., 241 U. S. 79; Tot v. United States, 319 U. S. 463. Cf. Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U. S. 86; Frank v. Mangum, 237 U. S. 309; Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U. S. 319.

Under our analysis, the Act finds and removes from administrative adjudication all the facts essential to a determination against petitioner (see supra, pp. 14-16). But even if only one of the essential facts had been legislatively predetermined, due process would be violated.

1. One of these essential facts is, obviously, the existence of a world Communist movement having the attributes ascribed to it by section 2 of the Act. For by definition (Sec. 3(3)), a Communist action organization is one which is controlled by and advances the objectives of "the world Communist movement referred to in section 2." Yet the findings in Section 2 on the existence and nature of a world Communist movement are incorporated into Sections 3(3) and 13(e) as assumptions of fact which the Board is not authorized to reexamine, but is required to accept as the foundation for its decision.

This circumstance was acknowledged by the court below. It held that for the purposes of reviewing the sufficiency of the evidence, the court was required to accept the Congressional finding of "a world Communist movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, sabotage, or any other necessary means, to establish a Communist proletarian dictatorship throughout the world" (Op. 56).[57]

[57] The Board took the same position in its brief below. See supra, p. 15.

The court nevertheless held that this legislative determination was not a denial of due process, stating (Op. 55):

> "The rule, as we understand it, is that, if it appears Congress has power over the subject matter of a statute, and if the findings of fact are not baseless but are based on extensive investigation, the courts are to adopt these findings."

It is apparent that the court below relied on an inapplicable rule. Legislative findings of fact, if not unreasonable, are conclusive for the purpose of supporting the policy of a particular law where its constitutionality is at issue. But this principle does not permit legislative findings to take the place of proof in an adversary proceeding that a specific organization or person is within the scope of the statute and thus subject to liability.

If the court's proposition were sound, Congress by making the necessary findings, could order petitioner to register under the Act and could impose sanctions on its members without any hearing whatsoever. We submit that review by this Court is required to determine whether due process permits such imposition of liability by legislative fiat.

2. As we have also seen (supra, p. 15), Section 2 predetermines the existence in this country of a "Communist-action" organization having the major characteristics which, when supposedly found by the Board, determine the Board's decision. Nothing is left for the Board, therefore, but to supply the name of the organization which Congress had in mind as "the Communist-action organization in the United States." And the name itself was supplied in the legislative history of the Act, including the House and Senate reports accompanying the legislation (supra, p. 16). Thus the Board could not find that Petitioner was not the domestic "Communist-action" organization referred to in Section 2 without overruling Congress.[58]

[58] This Court has flatly held that "the Communist-action organization in the United States" referred to in section 2(15) refers to the petitioner herein. Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 535, 544.

Finally, petitioner was identified by name as a "Communist-action" organization by Section 4 of the Communist Control Act, enacted while the Court of Appeals had this proceeding under advisement.

The court below, however, rejected the contention that the Act violates due process because of its built-in finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization. Its ground was that "Petitioner is not mentioned" (Op. 39), meaning, apparently that petitioner is not mentioned by name in the text of the Act itself. We submit that the Court should review the question whether legislation which makes all necessary findings by fiat is valid merely because it does not name the accused in the text—even this omission being supplied in the legislative history and in subsequent legislation.

3. We urged below that the Act is invalid as a bill of attainder because it identifies petitioner as the object of the statutory sanctions and imposes punishment on petitioner and its members without a judicial trial, the Act providing only an administrative hearing as a prelude to liability. Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 277; United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303; Garner v. Board of Public Works, 341 U. S. 716, 722. The court below rejected this contention (Op. 40) on the ground that the Act does not punish petitioner and its members for past conduct, but merely regulates their future conduct. However, the effect of a registration order is not to regulate petitioner's future conduct but to proscribe all of its activities, however innocent, and thus to punish it by destroying it altogether. Moreover, the order punishes petitioner's members by subjecting them to sanctions solely because of their membership and regardless of the fitness of the individual member, if judged on his merits, to enjoy the privileges which the Act denies him. This Court has consistently held that the deprivation of a privilege constitutes punishment where the grounds for the deprivation bear no reasonable relation to the fitness of the individual to enjoy the privilege. Cummings v. Missouri, supra; Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 333; Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114; Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189.

Whether the sanctions of the Act are in fact punishment and whether the Act is therefore invalid as a bill of attainder are questions of fundamental importance which should be reviewed by this Court.

B. Whether the Act violates due process because it authorizes a determination that an organization is a Communist-action organization on the basis of irrational and vague criteria.

Legislation violates due process if it permits liability to be determined on the basis of criteria which are irrelevant to the ultimate issue or are too vague to supply an ascertainable standard of judgment. Tot v. United States, 319 U. S. 463; Manley v. Georgia, 279 U. S. 1; Western and Atlantic R. R. v. Henderson, 279 U. S. 639; McFarland v. American Sugar Co., 241 U. S. 79; Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219; Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495; Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507; Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U. S. 268; Kunz v. New York; 340 U. S. 290; Musser v. Utah, 333 U. S. 95; Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359; Connally v. General Construction Company, 269 U. S. 385.

Our previous analysis shows that the Act violates these principles. The standards which section 13(e) requires the Board to apply have no rational relation to the ultimate issue to be determined under Section 3(3) and are vague and indefinite (supra, pp. 16-18).[59]

[59] Messrs. John W. Davis, Charles Evans Hughes, Jr. and Seth W. Richardson advised the Senate Judiciary Committee that in their opinion the vagueness of the similar section of the Mundt-Nixon bill, the antecedent of the Act, rendered the entire bill unconstitutional. Hearings before Senate Judiciary Committee, 80th Cong., 2d Sess., on H. R. 5852, pp. 417, 421, 445.

The most striking instance of the irrationality of the Act is the fact that while Section 3(3) defines a Communist-action organization as one which promotes the seditious objectives attributed to the world Communist movement by Section 2, Section 13(e) authorizes the Board to issue a registration order without any proof whatsoever that the accused organization promotes seditious objectives. This fact was acknowledged below by the Board and accepted by the Court (supra, p. 17).

The court below attempted to meet the contention that Section 13(e) thus establishes an irrational system of proof, by stating (Op. 41-42):

> "The Party says that by the definition in Section 2 of the Statute the world Communist movement engages in espionage, treason, etc., whereas none of the eight 'tests' to be applied to a domestic organization involves any of those offenses; and that thus the whole of Section 13(e) is irrational. The argument misconceives both the text and the purpose of the section. The inquiry with which the statute as a whole is concerned is in two separate parts: (a) What is the world Communist movement? That is dealt with in section 2. (b) Is a certain domestic organization under the domination and control of that movement, and does it operate primarily to achieve its objectives? * * * The so-called 'tests' in section 13(e) are directed at the latter problem alone. Thus construed, as it obviously was intended to be, the section is apt and cogent."

This passage begs the question. If one of the issues of "the latter problem" is whether the domestic organization operates to achieve the objectives of the world Communist movement, all of which, as enumerated in Section 2, are seditious and unlawful, that issue cannot rationally be resolved against the organization by proof that it operates to achieve only benign and lawful objectives.

The court below shifted its position when it discussed the "directives and policies" test of Section 13(e)(1), stating (Op. 44):

> "The Party says that the 'directives and policies test' in Section 13(e)(1) is irrational. It says that the statutory definition of a Communist-action organization in Section 3(3) refers only to organizations which pursue objectives which are 'evil', whereas the test section refers to any objectives, good or bad.
>
> The crucial factor in the statute before us is the aim, spelled out in detail, of the world Communist movement to disestablish our system of government. Our government may well oppose the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship of the sort described in the definition, even if such a dictatorship does not meet the definition of 'evil' or even if it has many beneficent features."

But if "the crucial factor in the statute" is the alleged aim of the world Communist movement to disestablish our system of government, an accused organization cannot rationally be found to be a "Communist-action" organization in the absence of proof that it is engaged in promoting that aim. Yet no such proof is required by Section 13(e) or by any other section.

Moreover, the "crucial factor in the statute" is not simply the aim of the postulated world Communist movement to disestablish our system of government, but to do so by violent and unlawful means (e.g., Sec. 2(6)(15)). Indeed, it is only the latter factor which can support the finding of Section 2(15) that the American agent of the postulated world Communist movement presents "a clear and present danger to the security of the United States." Accordingly, an organization which operates to bring about a change in the existing social order in this country by peaceable and constitutional means cannot be a Communist-action organization. Yet none of the standards of Section 13(e) requires proof that petitioner operates to bring about social change through the use of violent or unconstitutional means. There is, therefore, no rational relation between the finding that it is a Communist-action organization and the evidence upon which the Act authorizes the Board to predicate the finding. The decision below sustaining the validity of Section 13(e) is contrary to the decisions of this Court invalidating legislation which predicated civil or criminal liability on the basis of irrational presumptions.[40]

The court below also stated (Op. 42) that Section 13(e) does not preclude the Board from considering relevant and material evidence not within the standards of the section. That assertion, if true, cannot save the Act. The fact that the Act authorizes the Board to decide on the basis of irrational standards is enough to invalidate it. Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 235. Moreover, the Board rested its decision exclusively on the standards of 13(e).

C. Whether the Act violates due process by establishing a Board which is necessarily biased, and has an interest in deciding, against petitioner, and whether petitioner was, in fact, denied a fair hearing.

As we have shown (supra, pp. 18-20), the structure of the Act is such that the Board could not have decided in favor of petitioner without rendering itself functus officio and, in effect, repealing the Act. Moreover, the Board members had a personal interest in ruling against petitioner in order to keep their jobs, salaries, and appointment patronage.

The Act thus exerted relentless pressures upon the Board to decide against petitioner. These pressures were reinforced by the surveillance of the conduct of the proceeding by an agent of the Senate committee, hostile to petitioner, which had pending before it the nominations of the Board members (supra, pp. 38-39).

[40] The court below stated (Op. 43) that section 13(e) "is a catalog of some basic considerations. There are no statutory presumptions." Obviously, however, a statutory presumption consists in a grant of authority to a fact-finding body to infer and find the existence of an ultimate fact from proof of other facts. That is precisely the office of section 13(e).

The court below did not discuss petitioner's contention that it was denied due process by trial before a Board which was under irresistible pressure to decide against petitioner and had a personal interest in the outcome. Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U. S. 510; United States ex rel. Accardi v. Shaughnessy, 347 U. S. 260; Wang Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U. S. 33; Fay v. New York, 332 U. S. 261; Morgan v. United States, 304 U. S. 1.

The court below also failed to discuss petitioner's contention that the Board erred in refusing to disqualify Board Chairman Brown and Member McHale (both members of the hearing panel) for their unseemly conduct, during the administrative proceeding, in making public speeches about the case, in which they manifested bias and prejudgment. See supra, p. 39; Berger v. United States, 255 U. S. 22.

The Court should review the decision below to determine whether the affirmance of the Board's order conflicts with the cited decisions of the Court and with fundamental principles of procedural due process.

D. Whether the Act violates due process by depriving petitioner's members of liberty and property merely by reason of their association, without proof of scienter and without according them a hearing.

As we have seen (supra, pp. 8-9), under the Act, a final registration order against petitioner will bar its members from virtually all public and private employment, deprive them of other important privileges, and require their public listing as disloyal persons. The members suffer these onerous sanctions regardless of their personal innocence and lack of knowledge of the alleged character of petitioner. Furthermore, they are afforded no opportunity to demonstrate at a hearing that they are fit persons to enjoy the privileges denied them. Instead, the fact of membership establishes a conclusive presumption of unfitness. In these respects, the Act seems clearly to violate due process under Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183, and Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485. The Act also infringes the principle that guilt may not be imputed for association. Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118; Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U. S. 135; DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353; Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242.[60a]

The court below held that the scienter requirement of Wieman was satisfied on the grounds that (a) a member has knowledge of his membership; and (b), "The statute before us requires that before these sanctions apply a member must have 'knowledge or notice' that the organization has registered or been finally ordered to register" (Op. 26). These grounds are both irrelevant and untrue.

As Wieman makes abundantly clear, the scienter required by due process is knowledge that the organization has seditious purposes. The requirement is not satisfied by knowledge of membership or knowledge or notice that the organization has been governmentally condemned.[61]

Furthermore, in view of the vague criteria of membership established by Section 5 of the Communist Control Act, it is not correct that "members" have knowledge of their [61] Moreover, knowledge of the issuance of a registration order does not carry knowledge that the organization has even been found to have seditious purposes, in view of the holding of the court below that a registration order may be issued without proof of such purposes (see supra, p. 17).

[60a] It is clear, and neither the Board nor the court below disputed, that petitioner has standing to challenge the Act for denying due process to petitioner's members. The sanctions imposed on the members directly and seriously injure petitioner. The test of standing is thus satisfied, since it requires only that the action challenged affect the interests of the complainant in a reasonably direct manner. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33; Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60; Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U. S. 249.

"membership". And it is a misreading of the statute to assume that knowledge or notice of a registration order [42] is a prerequisite to the imposition of the sanctions. Under the Act, such knowledge or notice is necessary to support criminal prosecutions for applying for a forbidden job or a passport or for a member's failure to register himself if the organization failed to list him (Sec. 5(a), 6(a), 8(b), 15(a)(2)). But even this limited "scienter" is not necessary to the imposition of the civil sanctions and disabilities of the Act. For employers must deny a member employment, the government must withhold a passport from him, and, if he is an alien, the government must deport him and may not naturalize him, all without reference to any kind of knowledge or notice on his part. See Secs. 6(b) and 5(a)(2) of the Act, and Sections 241(a)(6)(E) and 313(a)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Clearly the decision below on this issue conflicts with applicable decisions of this Court and with fundamental principles of due process.

E. Whether the registration requirement of the Act violates due process by virtue of the fact that Section 5 of the Communist Control Act makes it impossible to determine who must be registered as members.

The Act makes it necessary for petitioner, its officers, and others to determine who are members of petitioner. If the order becomes final, petitioner and its officers must register the names of all the members. Other individuals must determine whether they are members in order to know whether they may lawfully hold certain jobs or apply for passports and whether they must register themselves upon failure of the organization to register their names. All persons making these determinations must apply the criteria for membership in the Communist Party provided by [42] Under section 14(k), notice of a registration order is given to members by publication in the Federal Register of the fact that the order has become final.

Section 5 of the Communist Control Act, if they are to avoid the criminal penalties provided in Section 15 of the Act.

But, as we have seen (supra, p. 7), application of the criteria of Section 5 requires a knowledge of facts which petitioner and its officers cannot have. In addition, the criteria are vague and irrational. Consequently, petitioner and its officers cannot determine the identity of the members whom they are required to name in the registration statement. A final order of the Board, therefore, will leave petitioner and its officers hopelessly caught by the astronomically cumulative criminal penalties for omitting names from the registration statement and for false listings.

Other individuals are in the dilemma that they cannot tell from the vague criteria of Section 5 whether they are members of petitioner and thus subject to the requirements and penalties of the Act.[63]

The Court of Appeals dismisses Section 5, as well as the 1954 Act as a whole, with the statement (Op. 48) that, "we think it has no application." As to Section 5 at least, this statement is plainly erroneous.

We submit that the effect of Section 5 on the registration provisions of the Act presents constitutional questions of the highest public importance which should be reviewed by this Court.

F. Whether the Act is invalid because it violates the privilege against self-incrimination.

Section 7(h) makes it the individual duty of the officers to register petitioner.[64] In the event there is no registration by the organization or its officers, or if the registration statement omits the names of any members, the members must register themselves (Sec. 8). Failure to register as required is punishable by severe criminal penalties (Sec. 15).

[63] The situation is aggravated by the fact that none of the section 5 criteria are limited as to time, so that a person can be found to be presently a member on the basis of some incident of the remote past.

[64] Regulations of the Attorney General under Sec. 7 require the registration statement to be signed by the organization's principal officers and all the members of the governing Board. 28 C. F. R. 11.205.

The legislative scheme of the Act therefore culminates in an attempt to coerce confessions of membership in the Communist Party and participation in the criminal conspiracies described in Sections 2 and 4(a) of the Act. This is a crass violation of the privilege against self-incrimination. Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159.

Congress recognized the vulnerability of the Act on this ground by including a so-called immunity provision (Sec. 4(f)). That provision cannot save the Act, however, since the limited immunity it confers is not co-extensive with the privilege. Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547; United States v. Bryan, 339 U. S. 323.

A majority of the court below held that the privilege is not available to petitioner's officers and that its assertion at this time is premature (Op. 17-25). Both of these grounds are fully answered in Judge Bazelon's dissenting opinion (Op. 81-89), and it is therefore unnecessary to retrace the argument here.

The question presented is obviously novel and important, and should be reviewed by this Court.

G. Whether the Act, on its face and as applied, violates the First Amendment.

1. This Court has long held that statutes affecting speech, press and assembly must be narrowly drawn to meet a substantive evil which the legislature has power to control. A statute penalizing conduct or advocacy which lies outside the area protected by the First Amendment is nonetheless invalid if it is so broad that it likewise abridges protected expression or assembly. United States v. C.I.O., 335 U. S. 106; Schneider v. Irvington, 308 U. S. 147; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 308; Jones v. Opelika, 316 U. S. 584, 618 (dissenting opinion, adopted by the Court in Jones v. Opelika, 319 U. S. 103); Saia v. New York, 334 U. S. 558; Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507; Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359; DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353; Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495; Cf. Australian Communist Party v. Commonwealth, 83 C. L. R. 1, 187-88, 225-27.

The Act violates this principle. Although its justification, stated in Section 2, is the alleged misconduct of "Communist-action" organizations, its controls are not limited to misconduct. Instead, as we have shown (supra, pp. 7-11), the Act and the order suppress all of petitioner's activities, including its admittedly extensive peaceable advocacy and assembly. As the President said in a special message to Congress, the Act attempts to "proscribe for certain groups such as the Communists, certain activities that are perfectly proper for everyone else" (H. R. Doc. No. 679, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 6). Indeed, it is precisely peaceable conduct which the Act is designed to reach, since there is a plethora of other laws which punish seditious advocacy and provide for the registration of foreign agents.

In American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, the Court sustained a limited control statute only because the legislation "did not restrain the activities of the Communist Party as a political organization" (at 404) or proscribe or severely burden membership in it. The Act does the very things condemned by Douds.

The court below acknowledged that the Act abridges First Amendment rights (Op. 11). It does not deny that a final registration order will outlaw petitioner (Op. 38-39). It states, however (Op. 39):

> "• • • If an organization is actually operating primarily to achieve the objectives of a foreign organization dedicated to the establishment of a totalitarian > dictatorship in this country by other than constitutional processes, we perceive no constitutional obstacle to its outlawry."

This statement is plainly erroneous.[65] The facts assumed by the court would at most justify legislation penalizing the use or advocacy of "other than constitutional processes" for achieving the stated objective. They could not justify the proscription of peaceful advocacy and assembly by outlawing the organization.

The court below also stated (Op. 11):

> "The activities of a world Communist movement such as that described in this statute and of organizations in this country devoted to its objectives constitute a clear and present danger within the meaning of any definition of the point at which freedom of speech gives way to the requirements of government security."

This repeats the error of the previous excerpt. The fact, if it be one, that an organization is engaged in "dangerous" activities cannot warrant the suppression of its innocent and lawful advocacy and assembly. Moreover, the clear and present danger exception applies only to expression which, because of its content and under the circumstances of its dissemination, gives rise to danger. The Act, and the Board's order, however, restrain all of petitioner's future advocacy, regardless of its possible content and of the circumstances under which it may be disseminated.

The court below also held that the employment and passport sanctions of the Act are, when considered severally, reasonably related to the evil which Congress was attempting to reach and therefore do not violate the First Amendment (Op. 33-35). Undoubtedly, federal power exists to protect the government service and establishments vital to the national defense against espionage, sabotage and other criminal activities as well as to prohibit foreign travel for the effectuation of any such illegal enterprise. The Act, however, forecloses employment to a member and bars him from travel abroad notwithstanding his personal innocence, lack of criminal propensities and lack of guilty scienter (see supra, pp. 56-57). Furthermore, as the court below acknowledged, the Act does not require proof that either the organization, or any of its members has engaged in or advocated espionage, sabotage or other violent or unconstitutional means for the achievement of its political objectives (see supra, p. 17). It is clear, therefore, that the function of these sanctions, even when considered individually and apart from their setting in the Act as a whole, is not to protect the national security. Such protection, if needed, could have been provided by narrowly-drawn legislation addressed to that purpose. The Act's sanctions serve a different function, that of destroying the petitioner by denying its members their livelihood and liberties merely because of their membership.

[65] It is also inapplicable, since, as the court below held, the Act does not require proof of the use or advocacy of unconstitutional means as a prerequisite to outlawry by a registration order (see supra, p. 17; infra, p. 64).

(2) The Act imposes a prior restraint on protected speech, press and assembly. The Act and the order require petitioner to register as a criminal conspirator before it can engage in political advocacy. They also require petitioner to list all printing presses, mimeograph machines, etc., in its possession or that of its officers, members or groups in which it "has an interest" (Sec. 7(d)(6)).[60] Petitioner must also identify its publications and broadcasts with an invidious label whether or not it registers (Sec. 10). This requirement applies regardless of the content of the expression or the circumstances under which it occurs. Petitioner's exercise of the rights of speech and press is licensed not because its words are seditious or create a clear

The decision below therefore conflicts with this Court's condemnation of prior restraints on First Amendment rights. Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, 540, expressly condemns "the device of requiring previous registration as a condition for exercising" the rights of free speech and assembly. See also Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495; Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U. S. 444; Largent v. Texas, 318 U. S. 418; Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U. S. 496; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296; Schneider v. Irvington, 308 U. S. 147.

The court below distinguished Thomas v. Collins on the ground that "operation to achieve the objectives of a movement such as this statute describes is conduct sufficient to invoke Federal regulatory power" (Op. 14). The "objectives" referred to by the court are presumably the criminal and seditious objectives described in Section 2. Accordingly, the attempted distinction is fallacious, since the prior restraint of the Act is not limited to seditious advocacy, or even to advocacy by organizations which have been proved to have seditious objectives.

The court below equates the registration and labelling requirements of the Act with statutes requiring the registration of lobbyists and foreign agents and the identification of those who use the mails and the radio (Op. 32-33; 35-36). Those statutes, however, are non-discriminatory and non-invidious, whereas the Act's registration and labelling requirements are armband measures condemned in American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, supra, at 402. Moreover, in construing the statutes referred to by the court below, this Court has for constitutional reasons confined the controls to highly limited areas. United States v. Harris, 347 U. S. 612; Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236. The Act is not, and cannot be, so confined.

(3) The Act imposes sanctions upon an organization and its members on the basis of evidence of lawful and peaceable political advocacy and views.

The standards of Section 13(e) focus on views and policies and their expression. Thus the first standard refers to the method of formulation and the purpose of policies, the second to "non-deviation" of views and policies, the fourth to teaching, and the fifth to reporting. The views and policies need not be seditious or even false. Nor does the section require proof that petitioner advocates violent or unconstitutional means for the effectuation of its policies.

Congress cannot control even the advocacy of violence in the absence of a clear and present danger situation. Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494. Much less, therefore, can it punish an organization or its members upon evidence that the former advocates peaceable action, as to which no clear and present danger can arise.

The court below recognized (Op. 44-46) that none of the standards of Section 13(e) requires a showing of criminal activities or advocacy of violent or unconstitutional means. Nevertheless, the court states (Op. 44):

> "Our government may well oppose the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship of the sort described in the definition, even if such dictatorship does not meet the definition of 'evil' or even if it has many beneficent features."

The issue in this case, however, is not whether the government may "oppose" a radical political change but whether it may impose sanctions for the advocacy of such change. If the First Amendment does anything, it prohibits the national government from abridging such advocacy so long, at least, as the means advocated are non-violent or no clear and present danger exists. Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359; Gitlow v. New York, 268 U. S. 652, 673 (Holmes, J., dissenting); Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S.

118. The decision below is inconsistent with the principle established by these cases.

(4) Passing to the Act as applied, it is clear that the evidence on which the court below relied to sustain the ultimate finding of the Board consists of petitioner's views and policies. As we have seen, the court sustained the ultimate finding primarily on the basis of six factors. These deal exclusively with petitioner's adherence to Marxism-Leninism and its position on international questions (supra, pp. 33-34). Except as to "financial aid," the same thing is true of the evidence on which the court relied in sustaining the Board's findings under Section 13(e) which survived review (see supra, pp. 27-32). None of these views involve, or are found to involve, advocacy of violent or unconstitutional methods.

In essence, the court below sustained the registration order on the grounds that petitioner adheres to a school of political thought that believes in and works for "a classless, stateless world" and that petitioner's views on international questions are similar to those of the Soviet Union. Thus, applying the Act in accordance with its real purpose, the court sustained a death sentence against petitioner because it holds views that are presently unorthodox and unpopular.

If the decision below is allowed to stand, there remain no effective limitations on Congress' control over political expression. If Congress can punish "non-deviation" from Soviet views, it can penalize "non-deviation" from other views. In fact, the Communist-front provisions of the Act already punish "non-deviation" from petitioner's views (Sec. 13(f)). The decision below thus gives legal sanction to the pernicious current technique of condemning persons because some of their views "parallel" those of the Soviet Union or of Communists.[67]

[67] Robert Maynard Hutchins, when chancellor of the University of Chicago, stated: "It is now fashionable to call anybody with whom you disagree a Communist or a fellow-traveller. So Branch Rickey

This proceeding outdoes the heresy trials of earlier times. Heretics were burned for believing doctrines held to be false and wicked. The Act, however, as applied by the Board and the court below, punishes political heretics for promulgating doctrines which concededly may be true and good. It creates the strangest and most virulent of heresies—"non-deviation," including "non-deviation" from the truth.

Clearly, the question whether the Act, on its face and as applied, violates the First Amendment requires review by this Court.

III. The action of the court below in sustaining the order of the Board after striking two of the key findings on which it was based violates the Act and is in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court.

As we have seen (supra, p. 24), the Board rested its decision that petitioner is a Communist-action organization on findings adverse to petitioner under each of the eight criteria of Section 13(e). Since the Board's ultimate conclusion was based on the totality of these eight findings, it cannot be said that the same conclusion would have been reached if any of the findings had been omitted or had been to the contrary effect.

One who thinks that there are too many slums and too much lynching in America can be called a Fellow Traveller, for the Russians say the same. One who opposes racial discrimination or the Ku Klux Klan can be called a Fellow Traveller; for the Russians claim that they ought to be opposed. (Hearings of Illinois Seditious Activities Investigation Commission on University of Chicago and Roosevelt College, April 1949, pp. 20-21).

The court below struck the findings of the Board under the "reporting" and "secret practices" criteria of Section 13(e) on the ground that they were not supported by a preponderance of the evidence (Op. 72-74). Accordingly, the premises on which the Board acted do not support its conclusion, since it based its order on the sum of eight findings, not on six. Moreover, two of the six surviving findings had little if any weight against petitioner.[68] Nevertheless, the court below affirmed the order of the Board, instead of remanding for administrative redetermination in the light of the findings which survived.

This action violates Section 14 of the Act, which permits affirmance of an order of the Board only if the findings of the Board are supported by a preponderance of the evidence. The decision below also conflicts with the decisions of this Court that an administrative order cannot be upheld unless the grounds on which the agency acted to sustain its action. If the agency's ultimate conclusion rests in part on invalid subsidiary findings of fact, the reviewing court must remand the proceeding for agency redetermination. This is the appropriate action even though the reviewing court is of the opinion that the agency action could have been supported by valid subsidiary findings. National Labor Relations Board v. Virginia Electric & Power Co., 314 U. S. 469; S.E.C. v. Chenery Corp., 318 U. S. 80; F.P.C. v.

[68] The Board found that "financial aid" and "instruction and training" were not currently engaged in by petitioner (R. 88, 92). It advised the court below that "the Board could not have placed great reliance" on the "financial aid" criterion (Respondent's Br. below, p. 101). The court below recognized that the "financial aid" and "instruction and training" criteria had no great materiality to the ultimate issue (Op. 46).

The decision below establishes a precedent for future cases arising under the Act that the reviewing court will proceed as though it were the administrative agency and the Board its trial examiner. We submit that the decision represents an important departure from basic principles of administrative law which requires review by this Court.

IV. The decision below determines important questions concerning the interpretation and application of the Act. Some of these have not been, but should be, settled by this Court, and others were decided in a manner which conflicts with applicable decisions of this Court.

A. Whether the order of the Board and the decision below violate the Act for the reason that they rest on alleged conduct of petitioner which, if it ever occurred, was discontinued prior to the date of the Act.

As we have seen (supra, p. 24), the Act makes it the duty of the Board to determine whether an accused organization is a Communist-action organization at the time of the proceeding. Moreover, the Board was precluded from basing its order upon practices of petitioner which antedated the Act by the principle which favors the prospective construction of legislation and by constitutional considerations. White v. United States, 191 U. S. 545, 552; Shreveport v. Cole, 129 U. S. 36; Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 277; Pierce v. Carskadon, 83 U. S. 234; Burgess v. Salmon, 97 U. S. 381.

Accordingly, the Board was required to base its findings and order upon current conduct of the petitioner. Petitioner's practices prior to the date of the Act were relevant, if at all, only to the extent that they served to show or explain the purpose or character of post-Act activities. Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 705.[70]

[69] The action of the court below is also in conflict with its own decisions. Democrat Printing Co. v. F. C. C., 202 F. 2d 298; Mississippi River Fuel Corp. v. F. P. C., 163 F. 2d 433, 449.

There was no relevant post-Act evidence which could rationally support a registration order. The Board and the Court below compensated for this deficiency of proof by treating as determinative evidence of matters in the remote past which had been long abandoned, as, for example, petitioner's affiliation before 1940 with the Communist International. And findings unfavorable to petitioner were made and sustained on the "financial aid" and "instruction and training" standards of Section 13( even though these practices, if ever engaged in, were found by both the Board and the court below to have been discontinued well before enactment of the Act (see supra, pp. 25-26).

The Board rationalized its reliance on evidence of petitioner's practices prior to the date of the Act by invoking a vague presumption of "continuance" (R. 130). It nowhere identified the pre-Act evidence on which it relied as the foundation of the presumption or the nature of the pre-Act conduct presumed to have continued.[71] Moreover, continuance cannot be presumed in the face of petitioner's uncontradicted denials (Op. 51-52; R. 1211-27, 1235-41, 1282-84, 1288-91). "At most," a presumption of continuance "is but a rebuttable presumption which cannot be weighed in the balance as against evidence." Sherman Inv. Co. v.

[70] This decision states (at 706) that evidence of past transactions is not admissible even for this limited purpose where, as here, the effect of the proceeding is "to punish or to fasten liability on respondents for past conduct."

[71] The irrationality of the Board's approach is illustrated by the fact that it found that foreign instruction and training stopped in 1936 (R. 90, 92), some fourteen years before the Act. If there is an applicable "presumption," it should be one of discontinuance, not of continuance.

United States, 199 F. 2d 504, 507 (8th Cir.). Nor can continuance be presumed in the face of such changes in circumstances as petitioner's disaffiliation from, and the subsequent dissolution of, the Communist International. See 2 Wigmore on Evidence (3d ed.), Sec. 437. Neither can it be presumed that conduct permissible at the time of occurrence continued after passage of legislation imposing sanctions for such conduct. Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, supra; Wolf v. United States, 259 Fed. 388 (8th Cir.); Haywood v. United States, 268 Fed. 795 (8th Cir.).

The court below also invoked a presumption of continuance. It found that "in the years prior to 1940 the Communist Party USA was dominated and controlled by the world Communist movement" because during that period petitioner was affiliated with the Communist International and bound by its decisions (Op. 61-3). It then held that petitioner's past affiliation with the Communist International was decisive of its present status as a Communist-action organization, notwithstanding its own findings that the petitioner disaffiliated from the International in 1940 and that the International was dissolved in 1943 (Op. 64). The court's theory was that the past conduct of an organization is material to its present nature in the absence of "affirmative evidence of a departure from the established past" (Op. 63). It found that petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International and the latter's dissolution did not constitute such a "departure," stating:

> "To demonstrate a changed nature in the Party USA, some assertion of a change in substantive belief and program would have to be made" (Op. 64).
> "If the Communist Party USA does not adhere to the basic ultimate objective of Marxism-Leninism [i.e. 'a classless, stateless world'], some vivid evidence to that effect should be readily available * * *. But this record contains no such evidence" (Op. 66).

The Act, however, relates to an organization which is currently under foreign control. Obviously, control cannot be established by proof of voluntary adherence to doctrine. The court acknowledged that the Communist International, which it asserted once controlled petitioner, was dissolved in 1943. By the court's own admission, therefore, nothing now remains but voluntary continued adherence to doctrine. Nevertheless, the court presumed the continuance of the control from petitioner's failure to repudiate the doctrine. This is a palpable non sequitur and a violation of the Act.

United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201 (2d Cir.), goes further than any of the other authorities in the significance it attaches to evidence of conduct prior to the period in issue. But even Dennis recognizes (at 231): "It is toto coelo a different question whether we are treating them [acts performed prior to the critical period] as media concludendi or as the factum itself." Contrary to Dennis, both the Board and the Court treated pre-Act conduct as "the factum itself."

The principles stated and applied by the Board and the court below as to the function of pre-Act evidence violate the Act and conflict with principles established by decisions of this Court and by other Circuits.

The construction and application by the Board and the court below of the evidentiary criteria of section 13(e) present novel questions of major importance to the administration of the Act.

The common denominator of the standards of Section 13(e), as construed by the Board and the court below, is that they can be satisfied by proof of an organization's adherence to Marxism-Leninism and a similarity of its views on various international questions to those of the Soviet Union (supra, pp. 27-34). This becomes apparent from a closer examination of the application given to the "directives and policies," "non-deviation," "discipline," and "allegiance" criteria.[72] This application is untenable even under the purposefully loose terms of 13(e).

"Directives and policies." The Report and the court's opinion reveal that there was no evidence whatsoever that petitioner receives directives from the Soviet Union.[73] The Board however, found that the "directives" standard was satisfied primarily on the basis that the body of Communist literature on its face constitutes a series of "directives" from the Soviet Union to petitioner (supra, pp. 27-28). The court below sustained the Board's finding (Op. 70-1).

The thesis that a century-old, constantly evolving system of political thought, developed by thinkers of many nations and based on a comprehensive view of man and nature, constitutes a series of Soviet "directives" is absurd. Its absurdity is underscored by the Board's and the court's characterization of the doctrine as an "amorphous amalgam" permitting "a wide flexibility of tactics," "applicable under an endless variety of circumstances," and having an overall policy of doing "what is expedient under the given circumstances" (supra, p. 28).

Obviously, Marxism-Leninism cannot be a "directive" within the meaning of Section 13(e)(1). Nor can voluntary adherence to and application of its principles make the adherent subject to foreign control within the meaning of Section 3(3). In holding otherwise, the Board and the court below violated the Act and applied it in a manner prohibited by the First and Fifth Amendments.

[72] As to the remaining criteria, the court struck the Board's findings on "reporting" and "secret practices" (supra, p. 24), and both the Board and the court acknowledged that the findings on "financial aid" and "training" rested exclusively on remote evidence and have little weight (supra, p. 67).

[73] The Board found that prior to petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International in 1940, decisions and resolutions of that body were "directives" to petitioner (R. 11). The court apparently shared that view (Op. 71).

"Non-deviation." The standard of Section 13(e)(1) relates to "non-deviation" of views. The dictionary definition of "deviation" is "variation from the common way, from an established standard, position, etc." (Webster's New International Dictionary). Accordingly, deviation or non-deviation cannot occur unless there is a pre-existing standard or position from which it is possible to deviate.

The evidence showed that petitioner and the Soviet Union held similar views on a series of international issues. However, no showing was made or attempted that the Soviet view on any of these issues antedated petitioner's view. Nevertheless, both the Board and the court held that the non-deviation standard was satisfied, on the ground that the date sequence of the views was irrelevant (supra, p. 29). This holding is not only contrary to the plain language of the Act, but is also irrational. For it rests findings of foreign control on a similarity of views even though the alleged agent adopted its views in advance of the adoption of similar views by the alleged foreign principal.

The Board and the court below made still further irrational applications of the "non-deviation" standard. If non-deviation of views is to have any significance as proof of foreign agency, clearly it must be limited to views which are peculiar to the alleged principal. It would be absurd to infer domination of one person by another from the fact that both believe that the sum of two and two is four. Nevertheless, the Board and the court held that the non-deviation test was satisfied on the basis of views which were widely held by non-Communists, including in some instances the United States government, and which were demonstrably true or reasonable (supra, p. 29).

Moreover, "non-deviation" is at best tenuous circumstantial evidence of domination and control. Nevertheless, the hearing panel refused to allow the petitioner to rebut any inference from the similarity of its views and those of the Soviet Union by showing that the similarity was attributable, not to control of petitioner by the Soviet Union, but to the independent application by each of a system of thought held by all Communists. The Board, after affirming this irrational ruling of the panel, blandly found that the evidence failed to establish the fact that petitioner was thus prevented from proving (supra, p. 30).

Finally, it was obviously irrational for the Board to rely on perfectly legitimate views on political questions, some of which were in fact adopted as the official policy of the United States government, as one of the bases for the ultimate conclusion that petitioner operates to promote the seditious objectives attributed to the world Communist movement by Section 2 (see supra, p. 30).

"Discipline." The Board's adverse finding under the "discipline" standard rested, and was affirmed, on instances of petitioner's discipline of certain members, concerning which there is no evidence or suggestion of foreign intervention, and on the Communist principle of democratic centralism, which relates only to the internal management of an organization, and thus has no bearing on foreign control (supra, p. 32). By predicating the finding on the fact that petitioner and other Communist parties practice the principle of democratic centralism, the Board and the court below assimilated the "discipline" criterion to their version of the "non-deviation" standard. Petitioner was held subject to foreign discipline, and hence under foreign domination and control, because both it and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, like the Communists of all countries, believe that members of their parties should be bound to strict adherence to majority decisions.

"Allegiance." The Board's adverse finding on "allegiance," and the court's affirmance of the finding, rest primarily on the Marxist-Leninist literature which was considered in Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, and which, this Court held, did not support a finding that adherence to Marxism-Leninism is incompatible with attachment to the principles of the Constitution and being well disposed to the good order and happiness of the United States (supra, p. 32).

Manifestly, the Board and the court violated the Act in their construction and application of the standards of Section 13(e), did nothing to rescue the section from invalidity by confining it within rational limits, and contravened the Schneiderman decision. This Court should review the decision below to correct these errors and to prevent their repetition in future cases arising under the Act.

C. Whether the Board and the court below erroneously construed and applied the Act's definition of the world Communist movement.

We have already seen (supra, p. 15) that the court below held that the findings of Section 2 of the Act with reference to the existence and nature of a world Communist movement are conclusive upon the Board and the courts.[74] Nevertheless, the court reviewed and sustained the finding of the Board that, on the evidence, "there exists a world Communist movement substantially as described in section 2 of the Act" (Op. 61).

It is clear that the Board and the court below erroneously construed and applied Section 2 in concluding that the presence in various countries of the world of Communist parties which adhere to a common ideology establishes the existence of the world Communist movement described in that section (supra, pp. 34-36).

[74] The Board straddled the question. It first stated (R. 4) that it was "desirable" to make findings as to the world Communist movement. Then it stated (R. 130) that it was unnecessary to decide whether such findings are required by the Act inasmuch as it had already made them.

If this Court concludes that the existence of the world Communist movement described in Section 2 was a matter for determination by the Board, it is important that it review the affirmance below of the Board's finding.[75] For the entire structure of the Act and its justification for the sanctions on petitioner, its members, other organizations and their members is predicated on the validity of the finding.[76]

As we have seen (supra, p. 40), petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence showed that three of the Attorney General's professional witnesses, Crouch, Johnson and Matusow, upon whose testimony the Board relied for material findings of fact, had committed perjury in other proceedings[77] and that because of their publicly demonstrated untrustworthiness the Attorney General had ceased to employ them as witnesses. As we have also seen (ibid.), the Board itself recognized in Brownell v. Labor

[75] If, as we and the court below interpret the Act, this matter is not a subject for administrative adjudication, then the Act is palpably unconstitutional as fiat legislation (supra, pp. 47-51), and review is required for that reason.

[76] Section 2 paraphrases Hitler who declared: "The Communist Party was a section of a political movement which had its headquarters abroad and was directed from abroad . . . We look on Bolshevism as a world peril for which there must be no toleration." Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, U. S. Gov't Printing Office, 1946, vol. 1, p. 246. The United States was once the subject of "findings" like those which section 2 makes about the Soviet Union. Thus, Count Metternich charged in 1820 that, "These United States * * * have cast blame and scorn on the institutions of Europe most worthy of respect . . . fostering revolution wherever they show themselves . . . they lend new strength to the apostles of sedition, and reanimate the courage of every conspirator." Quoted in Dexter Perkins, Hands Off! A History of the Monroe Doctrine, Boston, 1941, pp. 56-57.

Youth League, that the facts stated in petitioner's motion with reference to Matusow make him unworthy of any credence whatsoever.

The Board nevertheless opposed petitioner's motion[18] and the court below denied it without opinion (R. 2082). The action of the court in so doing violates Section 14 of the Act. Section 14 requires the allowance of a motion to adduce additional evidence upon a showing that such evidence is material—i.e. that it might change the result reached by the agency. Clearly, the testimony in this proceeding of the three informers in question was material since, as is apparent from the face of the Report, the Board relied extensively on their testimony in making its subsidiary findings of fact. The additional evidence proffered by petitioner would have completely destroyed or at least seriously impaired the credibility of this material testimony. Obviously, therefore, the additional evidence was itself material.

The decision below not only violates Section 14 but is inconsistent with the decision of this Court applying a similar section of the National Labor Relations Act. NLRB v. Indiana and Michigan Electric Co., 318 U. S. 9.

Furthermore, petitioner's motion presents an issue of great public importance concerning the testimony of professional informers. The reckless use by the Department of Justice of these informers in "security" cases is compromising the administration of justice. It has aroused widespread apprehension and alarm, particularly in the light of current revelations of the untrustworthiness of testimony which the government has bought and paid for. As has recently been stated (N. Y. Times editorial, July 8, 1954):

[18] Cf. the recent televised statement by the Attorney General that when one of the government's informer witnesess is found to be unreliable, "then it is the government's obligation to follow up to see that he is punished and that anybody who has been hurt by his testimony, if it's false, is given a new chance." New York World-Telegram, March 28, 1955.

> "If the Department of Justice feels it essential to use informers in its anti-Communist prosecutions under the law, it has the unmistakable duty to follow up relentlessly any indication that they may not be telling the truth. As the law enforcement agency of our government, the Department of Justice has a primary obligation to maintain its own integrity and that of its agents."

When the Department of Justice and administrative agencies are derelict in this obligation, the courts should be scrupulous to enforce it by insisting, at a minimum, that the evidence of perjury be heard and considered. The failure of the court below to take this minimal action should be reviewed if the abuse of the judicial process through hired informers is to be curbed and the liberties of individuals and organizations safeguarded against false testimony.

E. Whether the findings of the Board are unsupported by the preponderance of the evidence, and whether the Report of the Board and the opinion of the court below demonstrate on their face the insufficiency of the evidence.

Section 14(a) of the Act provides that upon review the Board's findings as to the facts are conclusive only if supported by the preponderance of the evidence. The court below found that the order was supported by the preponderance of the evidence (Op. 76).

As we have seen, the authors of the Act realized that relevant evidence was not available to prove that petitioner is a Communist-action organization. They therefore designed the standards of section 13(e) to guarantee the issuance of a registration order upon irrelevant evidence which they believed was available (supra, pp. 16-18). It developed at the hearing, however, that the Attorney General was unable to produce even the irrelevant evidence on which the Act's sponsors had counted.

It was for this reason that, as we have seen and as appears from the face of the Report, the Board was compelled to exaggerate the irrationalities of section 13(e), to impute sinister significance to patently legitimate conduct, to distort the century-old body of Communist theory into "directives" from the Soviet Union, to rely on evidence of remote practices admittedly long discontinued, to utilize protected political expression as "evidence" of seditious foreign agency, and otherwise to substitute prejudice and prejudgment for proof. For the same reason, the Board relied on the testimony of the Attorney General's professional informer witnesses notwithstanding their demonstrated lack of veracity (supra, p. 22).

Nevertheless, the court below affirmed the order of the Board. It did so even though it struck two of the key findings on which the order was based, on the ground that they were not supported by the preponderance of the evidence. The court's affirmance was based on what it called six underlying "basic facts," which do not satisfy the standards of section 13(e) or the 3(3) definition (supra, pp. 33-34).

Review of the preponderance questions is demanded not only because of the manifest errors of the Board and the court below and because of the unprecedented effect of the order in outlawing a political party. It is also required because the finding against petitioner concludes the rights of other organizations. The Act contemplates that once the petitioner is finally found to be a Communist-action organization, that issue cannot be relitigated by organizations accused of being Communist-front or infiltrated. And so the Board has recently held. In issuing its first registration order against an organization accused of being a Communist-front, it held that "the prior determination by the Board that the Communist Party is a Communist-action organization is conclusive and applicable in this proceeding without further proof." Report of the Board, Brownell v. Labor Youth League, No. 102-53, Feb. 15, 1955, pp. 54-55.

any officer or employee of the United States or of any department or agency thereof or of any corporation the stock of which is owned in whole or in major part by the United States or any department or agency thereof, any information of a kind which shall have been classified by the President (or by the head of any such department, agency, or corporation with the approval of the President) as affecting the security of the United States, unless special authorization for such communication shall first have been obtained from the head of the department, agency, or corporation having custody of or control over such information.

(d) Any person who violates any provision of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than ten years, or by both such fine and such imprisonment, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to hold any office, or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

(e) Any person may be prosecuted, tried, and punished for any violation of this section at any time within ten years after the commission of such offense, notwithstanding the provisions of any other statute of limitations: Provided, That if at the time of the commission of the offense such person is an officer or employee of the United States or of any department or agency thereof, or of any corporation the stock of which is owned in whole or in major part by the United States or any department or agency thereof, such person may be prosecuted, tried, and punished for any violation of this section at any time within ten years after such person has ceased to be employed as such officer or employee.

(f) Neither the holding of office nor membership in any Communist organization by any person shall constitute per se a violation of subsection (a) or subsection (c) of this section or of any other criminal statute. The fact of the registration of any person under section 7 or section 8 of this title as an officer or member of any Communist organization shall not be received in evidence against such person in any prosecution for any alleged violation of subsection (a) or subsection (c) of this section or for any alleged violation of any other criminal statute.

EMPLOYMENT OF MEMBERS OF COMMUNIST ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 5. (a) When a Communist organization, as defined in paragraph (5) of section 3 of this title, is registered or there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register, it shall be unlawful—

(1) For any member of such organization, with knowledge or notice that such organization is so registered or that such order has become final—

(A) in seeking, accepting, or holding any nonelective office or employment under the United States, to conceal or fail to disclose the fact that he is a member of such organization; or

(B) to hold any nonelective office or employment under the United States; or

(C) in seeking, accepting, or holding employment in any defense facility, to conceal or fail to disclose the fact that he is a member of such organization; or

(D) if such organization is a Communist-action organization, to engage in any employment in any defense facility; or

(E)[3] to hold office or employment with any labor organization, as that term is defined in section 2(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (29 U. S. C. 152), or to represent any employer in any matter or proceeding arising or pending under that Act.

(2) For any officer or employee of the United States or of any defense facility, with knowledge or notice that such organization is so registered or that such order has become final—

(A) to contribute funds or services to such organization; or

(B) to advise, counsel or urge any person, with knowledge or notice that such person is a member of such organization, to perform, or to omit to perform, any act if such act or omission would constitute a violation of any provision of subparagraph (1) of this subsection.

(b) The Secretary of Defense is authorized and directed to designate and proclaim, and from time to time revise, a list of facilities, as defined in paragraph (7) of section 3 of this title, with respect to the operation of which he finds and determines that the security of the United States requires the application of the provisions of subsection (a) of this section. The Secretary shall cause such list as designated and proclaimed, or any revision thereof, to be promptly published in the Federal Register, and shall promptly notify the management of any facility so listed; whereupon such management shall immediately post conspicuously, and thereafter while so listed keep posted, notice of such designation in such form and in such place or places as to give reasonable notice thereof to all employees of, and to all applicants for employment in, such facility.

Denial of Passports to Members of Communist Organizations

Sec. 6. (a) When a Communist organization as defined in paragraph (5) of section 3 of this title is registered, or there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register, it shall be unlawful for any member of such organization, with knowledge or notice that such organization is so registered or that such order has become final—

(1) to make application for a passport, or the renewal of a passport, to be issued or renewed by or under the authority of the United States; or

(2) to use or attempt to use any such passport.

(b) When an organization is registered, or there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring an organization to register, as a Communist-action organization, it shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States to issue a passport to, or renew the passport of, any individual knowing or having reason to believe that such individual is a member of such organization.

(c)[5] As used in this section, the term "member" shall not include any individual whose name has not been made public because of the prohibition contained in section 9(b) of this title.

Registration and Annual Reports of Communist Organizations

Sec. 7. (a) Each Communist-action organization (including any organization required, by a final order of the Board, to register as a Communist-action organization) shall, within the time specified in subsection (c) of this section, register with the Attorney General, on a form prescribed by him by regulations, as a Communist-action organization.

(b) Each Communist-front organization (including any organization required, by a final order of the Board, to register as a Communist-front organization) shall, within the time specified in subsection (c) of this section, register with the Attorney General, on a form prescribed by him by regulations, as a Communist-front organization.

(c) The registration required by subsection (a) or (b) shall be made—

(1) in the case of an organization which is a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization on the date of the enactment of this title, within thirty days after such date;

(2) in the case of an organization becoming a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization after the date of the enactment of this title, within thirty days after such organization becomes a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization, as the case may be; and

(3) in the case of an organization which by a final order of the Board is required to register, within thirty days after such order becomes final.

(d) The registration made under subsection (a) or (b) shall be accompanied by a registration statement, to be prepared and filed in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, containing the following information:

(1) The name of the organization and the address of its principal office.

(2) The name and last-known address of each individual who is at the time of filing of such registration statement, and of each individual who was at any time during the period of twelve full calendar months next preceding the filing of such statement, an officer of the organization, with the designation or title of the office so held, and with a brief statement of the duties and functions of such individual as such officer.

(3) An accounting, in such form and detail as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, of all moneys received and expended (including the sources from which received and the purposes for which expended) by the organization during the period of twelve full calendar months next preceding the filing of such statement.

(4) In the case of a Communist-action organization, the name and last-known address of each individual who was a member of the organization at any time during the period of twelve full calendar months preceding the filing of such statement.

(5) In the case of any officer or member whose name is required to be shown in such statement, and who uses or has used or who is or has been known by more than one name, each name which such officer or member uses or has used or by which he is known or has been known.

(6) A listing, in such form and detail as the Attorney General shall by regulation prescribe, of all printing presses and machines including but not limited to rotary presses, flatbed cylinder presses, platen presses, lithographs, offsets, photo-offsets, mimeograph machines, multigraph machines, multilith machines, duplicating machines, ditto machines, linotype machines, intertype machines, monotype machines, and all other types of printing presses, typesetting machines or any mechanical devices used or intended to be used, or capable of being used to produce or publish printed matter or material, which are in the possession, custody, ownership, or control of the Communist-action or Communist-front organization or its officers, members, affiliates, associates, group, or groups in which the Communist-action or Communist-front organization, its officers or members have an interest.[6]

(e) It shall be the duty of each organization registered under this section to file with the Attorney General on or before February 1 of the year following the year in which it registers, and on or before February 1 of each succeeding year, an annual report, prepared and filed in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, containing the same information which by subsection (d) is required to be included in a registration statement, except that the information required with respect to the twelve-month period referred to in paragraph (2), (3), or (4) of such subsection shall, in such annual report, be given with respect to the calendar year preceding the February 1 on or before which such annual report must be filed.

(f)(1) It shall be the duty of each organization registered under this section to keep, in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, accurate records and accounts of moneys received and expended (including the sources from which received and purposes for which expended) by such organization.

(2) It shall be the duty of each Communist-action organization registered under this section to keep, in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, accurate records of the names and addresses of the members of such organization and of persons who actively participate in the activities of such organization.

(g) It shall be the duty of the Attorney General to send to each individual listed in any registration statement or annual report, filed under this section, as an officer or member of the organization in respect of which such registration statement or annual report was filed, a notification in writing that such individual is so listed; and such notification shall be sent at the earliest practicable time after the filing of such registration statement or annual report. Upon written request of any individual so notified who denies that he holds any office or membership (as the case may be) in such organization, the Attorney General shall forthwith initiate and conclude at the earliest practicable time an appropriate investigation to determine the truth or falsity of such denial, and, if the Attorney General shall be satisfied that such denial is correct, he shall thereupon strike from such registration statement or annual report the name of such individual. If the Attorney General shall decline or fail to strike the name of such individual from such registration statement or annual report within five months after receipt of such written request, such individual may file with the Board a petition for relief pursuant to section 13(b) of this title.

(h) In the case of failure on the part of any organization to register or to file any registration statement or annual report as required by this section, it shall be the duty of the executive officer (or individual performing the ordinary and usual duties of an executive officer) and of the secretary (or individual performing the ordinary and usual duties of a secretary) of such organization, and of such officer or officers of such organization as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, to register for such organization, to file such registration statement, or to file such annual report, as the case may be.

REGISTRATION OF MEMBERS OF COMMUNIST-ACTION ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 8. (a) Any individual who is or becomes a member of any organization concerning which (1) there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register under section 7(a) of this title as a Communist-action organization, (2) more than thirty days have elapsed since such order has become final, and (3) such organization is not registered under section 7 of this title as a Communist-action organization, shall within sixty days after said order has become final, or within thirty days after becoming a member of such organization, whichever is later, register with the Attorney General as a member of such organization.

(b) Each individual who is or becomes a member of any organization which he knows to be registered as a Communist-action organization under section 7(a) of this title, but to have failed to include his name upon the list of members thereof filed with the Attorney General, pursuant to the provisions of subsections (d) and (e) of section 7 of this title, shall, within sixty days after he shall have obtained such knowledge, register with the Attorney General as a member of such organization.

(c) The registration made by any individual under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be accompanied by a registration statement to be prepared and filed in such manner and form, and containing such information, as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe.

KEEPING OF REGISTERS; PUBLIC INSPECTION; REPORTS TO PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS

SEC. 9. (a) The Attorney General shall keep and maintain separately in the Department of Justice—

(1) a "Register of Communist-Action Organizations", which shall include (A) the names and addresses of all Communist-action organizations registered under section 7, (B) the registration statements and annual reports filed by such organizations thereunder, and (C) the registration statements filed by individuals under section 8; and

(2) a "Register of Communist-Front Organizations", which shall include (A) the names and addresses of all Communist-front organizations registered under section 7, and (B) the registration statements and annual reports filed by such organizations thereunder.

(b) Such registers shall be kept and maintained in such manner as to be open for public inspection: Provided, That the Attorney General shall not make public the name of any individual listed in either such register as an officer or member of any Communist organization until sixty days shall have elapsed after the transmittal of the notification required by section 7(g) to be sent to such individual, and if prior to the end of such period such individual shall make written request to the Attorney General for the removal of his name from any such list, the Attorney General shall not make public the name of such individual until six months shall have elapsed after receipt of such request by the Attorney General, or until thirty days shall have elapsed after the Attorney General shall have denied such request and shall have transmitted to such individual notice of such denial, whichever is earlier.

(c) The Attorney General shall submit to the President and to the Congress on or before June 1 of each year (and at any other time when requested by either House by resolution) a report with respect to the carrying out of the provisions of this title, including the names and addresses of the organizations listed in such registers and (except to the extent prohibited by subsection (b) of this section) the names and addresses of the individuals listed as members of such organizations.

(d) Upon the registration of each Communist organization under the provisions of this title, the Attorney General shall publish in the Federal Register the fact that such organization has registered as a Communist-action organization, or as a Communist-front organization, as the case may be, and the publication thereof shall constitute notice to all members of such organization that such organization has so registered.

USE OF THE MAILS AND INSTRUMENTALITIES OF INTERSTATE OR FOREIGN COMMERCE

SEC. 10. It shall be unlawful for any organization which is registered under section 7, or for any organization with respect to which there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring it to register under section 7, or determining that it is a Communist-infiltrated organization,[7] or for any person acting for or on behalf of any such organization—

(1) to transmit or cause to be transmitted, through the United States mails or by any means or instrumentality of interstate or foreign commerce, any publication which is intended to be, or which it is reasonable to believe is intended to be, circulated or disseminated among two or more persons, unless such publication, and any envelope, wrapper, or other container in which it is mailed or otherwise circulated or transmitted, bears the following, printed in such manner as may be provided in regulations prescribed by the Attorney General, with the name of the organization appearing in lieu of the blank: "Disseminated by ————————, a Communist organization"; or

(2) to broadcast or cause to be broadcast any matter over any radio or television station in the United States, unless such matter is preceded by the following statement, with the name of the organization being stated in place of the blank: "The following program is sponsored by ————————, a Communist organization".

[7] Reference to Communist-infiltrated organizations added by sec. 8(a) of the Communist Control Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 778.

DENIAL OF TAX DEDUCTIONS AND EXEMPTIONS

SEC. 11. (a) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, no deduction for Federal income-tax purposes shall be allowed in the case of a contribution to or for the use of any organization if at the time of the making of such contribution (1) such organization is registered under section 7, or (2) there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register under section 7 or determining that it is a Communist-infiltrated organization.[8]

(b) No organization shall be entitled to exemption from Federal income tax, under section 101 of the Internal Revenue Code, for any taxable year if at any time during such taxable year (1) such organization is registered under section 7, or (2) there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register under section 7 or determining that it is a Communist-infiltrated organization.[9]

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD

SEC. 12. (a) There is hereby established a board, to be known as the Subversive Activities Control Board, which shall be composed of five members, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than three members of the Board shall be members of the same political party. Two of the original members shall be appointed for a term of one year, two for a term of two years, and one for a term of three years, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of three years each, except that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Board.

[9] See footnote 7.

Any member of the Board may be removed by the President, upon notice and hearing, for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, but for no other cause.

(b) Any vacancy in the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Board, and three members of the Board shall, at all times, constitute a quorum. The Board shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

(c) The Board shall at the close of each fiscal year make a report in writing to the Congress and to the President stating in detail the cases it has heard, the decisions it has rendered, the names, salaries, and duties of all employees of the Board, and an account of all moneys it has disbursed.

(d) Each member of the Board shall receive a salary of $15,000 a year,[10] shall be eligible for reappointment, and shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment.

(e) It shall be the duty of the Board—

(1) upon application made by the Attorney General under section 13(a) of this title, or by any organization under section 13(b) of this title, to determine whether any organization is a "Communist-action organization" within the meaning of paragraph (3) of section 3 of this title, or a "Communist-front organization" within the meaning of paragraph (4) of section 3 of this title; and

(2) upon application made by the Attorney General under section 13(a) of this title, or by any individual under section 13(b) of this title, to determine whether any individual is a member of any Communist-action organization registered, or by final order of the Board required to be registered, under section 7(a) of this title; and

[10] Originally $12,500. Raised to present figure by Act of July 12, 1952. 66 Stat. 590, 50 U. S. C. Supp. 791(d).

(3) upon any application made under subsection (a) or subsection (b) of section 13A of this title, to determine whether any organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization.[11]

(f) Subject to the civil-service laws and Classification Act of 1949, the Board may appoint and fix the compensation of a chief clerk and such examiners and other personnel as may be necessary for the performance of its functions.

(g) The Board may make such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this title, as may be necessary for the performance of its duties.

(h) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Board such sums as may be necessary to carry out its functions.

REGISTRATION PROCEEDINGS BEFORE BOARD[12]

SEC. 13. (a) Whenever the Attorney General shall have reason to believe that any organization which has not registered under subsection (a) or subsection (b) of section 7 of this title is in fact an organization of a kind required to be registered under such subsection, or that any individual who has not registered under section 8 of this title is in fact required to register under such section, he shall file with the Board and serve upon such organization or individual a petition for an order requiring such organization or individual to register pursuant to such subsection or section, as the case may be. Each such petition shall be verified under oath, and shall contain a statement of the facts upon which the Attorney General relies in support of his prayer for the issuance of such order.

(b) Any organization registered under subsection (a) or subsection (b) of section 7 of this title, and any individual registered under section 8 of this title, may, not oftener than once in each caler lar year, make application to the Attorney General for the cancellation of such registration and (in the case of such organization) for relief from obligation to make further annual reports. Within sixty days after the denial of any such application by the Attorney General, the organization or individual concerned may file with the Board and serve upon the Attorney General a petition for an order requiring the cancellation of such registration and (in the case of such organization) relieving such organization of obligation to make further annual reports. Any individual authorized by section 7(g) of this title to file a petition for relief may file with the Board and serve upon the Attorney General a petition for an order requiring the Attorney General to strike his name from the registration statement or annual report upon which it appears.

(c) Upon the filing of any petition pursuant to subsection (a) or subsection (b) of this section, the Board (or any member thereof or any examiner designated thereby) may hold hearings, administer oaths and affirmations, may examine witnesses and receive evidence at any place in the United States, and may require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records deemed relevant, to the matter under inquiry. Subpenas may be signed and issued by any member of the Board or any duly authorized examiner. Subpenas shall be issued on behalf of the organization or the individual who is a party to the proceeding upon request and upon a statement or showing of general relevance and reasonable scope of the evidence sought. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. Witnesses summoned shall be paid the same fees and mileage paid witnesses in the district courts of the United States. In case of disobedience to a subpena, the Board may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence. Any of the district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person, issue an order requiring such person to appear (and to produce documentary evidence if so ordered) and give evidence relating to the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district whereof such person is an inhabitant or wherever he may be found. No person shall be held liable in any action in any court, State or Federal, for any damages resulting from (1) his production of any documentary evidence in any proceeding before the Board if he is required, by a subpena issued under this subsection, to produce the evidence; or (2) any statement under oath he makes in answer to a question he is asked while testifying before the Board in response to a subpena issued under this subsection, if the statement is pertinent to the question.

(d)(1) All hearings conducted under this section shall be public. Each party to such proceeding shall have the right to present its case with the assistance of counsel, to offer oral or documentary evidence, to submit rebuttal evidence, and to conduct such cross-examination as may be required for a full and true disclosure of the facts. An accurate stenographic record shall be taken of the testimony of each witness, and a transcript of such testimony shall be filed in the office of the Board.

(2) Where an organization or individual declines or fails to appear at a hearing accorded to such organization or individual by the Board pursuant to this section, the Board may, without further proceedings and without the introduction of any evidence, enter an order requiring such organization or individual to register or denying the application of such organization or individual, as the case may be. Where in the course of any hearing before the Board or any examiner thereof a party or counsel is guilty of misbehavior which obstructs the hearing, such party or counsel may be excluded from further participation in the hearing.

(e) In determining whether any organization is a "Communist-action organization", the Board shall take into consideration—

(1) the extent to which its policies are formulated and carried out and its activities performed, pursuant to directives or to effectuate the policies of the foreign government or foreign organization in which is vested, or under the domination or control of which is exercised, the direction and control of the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title; and

(2) the extent to which its views and policies do not deviate from those of such foreign government or foreign organization; and

(3) the extent to which it receives financial or other aid, directly or indirectly, from or at the direction of such foreign government or foreign organization; and

(4) the extent to which it sends members or representatives to any foreign country for instruction or training in the principles, policies, strategy, or tactics of such world Communist movement; and

(5) the extent to which it reports to such foreign government or foreign organization or to its representatives; and

(6) the extent to which its principal leaders or a substantial number of its members are subject to or recognize the disciplinary power of such foreign government or foreign organization or its representatives; and

(7) the extent to which, for the purpose of concealing foreign direction, domination, or control, or of expediting or promoting its objectives, (i) it fails to disclose, or resists efforts to obtain information as to its membership (by keeping membership lists in code, by instructing members to refuse to acknowledge membership, or by any other method); (ii) its members refuse to acknowledge membership therein; (iii) it fails to disclose, or resists efforts to obtain information as to, records other than membership lists; (iv) its meetings are secret; and (v) it otherwise operates on a secret basis; and

(8) the extent to which its principal leaders or a substantial number of its members consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their obligations to such foreign government or foreign organization.

(f) In determining whether any organization is a "Communist-front organization", the Board shall take into consideration—

(1) the extent to which persons who are active in its management, direction, or supervision, whether or not holding office therein, are active in the management, direction, or supervision of, or as representatives of, any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2; and

(2) the extent to which its support, financial or otherwise, is derived from any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2; and

(3) the extent to which its funds, resources, or personnel are used to further or promote the objectives of any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2; and

(4) the extent to which the positions taken or advanced by it from time to time on matters of policy do not deviate from those of any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2.

(g) If, after hearing upon a petition filed under subsection (a) of this section, the Board determines—

(1) that an organization is a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization, as the case may be, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and cause to be served on such organization an order requiring such organization to register as such under section 7 of this title; or

(2) that an individual is a member of a Communist-action organization (including an organization required by final order of the Board to register under section 7(a)), it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and cause to be served on such individual an order requiring him to register as such under section 8 of this title.

(h) If, after hearing upon a petition filed under subsection (a) of this section, the Board determines—

(1) that an organization is not a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization, as the case may be, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts; issue and cause to be served upon the Attorney General an order denying his petition for an order requiring such organization to register as such under section 7 of this title; and send a copy of such order to such organization; or

(2) that an individual is not a member of any Communist-action organization, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts; issue and cause to be served upon the Attorney General an order denying his petition for an order requiring such individual to register as such member under section 8 of this title; and send a copy of such order to such individual.

(i) If, after hearing upon a petition filed under subsection (b) of this section, the Board determines—

(2) that an individual is not a member of any Communist-action organization, or (in the case of an individual listed as an officer of a Communist-front organization) that an individual is not an officer of a Communist-front organization, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts; issue and cause to be served upon the Attorney General an order requiring him to (A) strike the name of such individual from the registration statement or annual report upon which it appears or (B) cancel the registration of such individual under section 8, as may be appropriate; and send a copy of such order to such individual.

(j) If, after hearing upon a petition filed under subsection (b) of this section, the Board determines—

(2) that an individual is a member of a Communist-action organization, or (in the case of an individual listed as a officer of a Communist-front organization) that an individual is an officer of a Communist-front organization, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and cause to be served on such individual an order denying his petition for an order requiring the Attorney General (A) to strike his name from any registration statement or annual report on which it appears or (B) to cancel the registration of such individual under section 8, as the case may be.

(k) When any order of the Board requiring registration of a Communist organization becomes final under the provisions of section 14(b) of this title, the Board shall publish in the Federal Register the fact that such order has become final, and publication thereof shall constitute notice to all members of such organization that such order has become final.

PROCEEDINGS WITH RESPECT TO COMMUNIST-INFILTRATED ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 13A.[13] (a) Whenever the Attorney General has reason to believe that any organization is a Communist infiltrated organization, he may file with the Board and serve upon such organization a petition for a determination that such organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization. In any proceeding so instituted, two or more affiliated organizations may be named as joint respondents. Whenever any such petition is accompanied by a certificate of the Attorney General to the effect that the proceeding so instituted is one of exceptional public importance, such proceeding shall be set for hearing at the earliest possible time and all proceedings therein before the Board or any court shall be expedited to the greatest practicable extent.

(b) Any organization which has been determined under this section to be a Communist-infiltrated organization may, within six months after such determination, file with the Board and serve upon the Attorney General a petition for a determination that such organization no longer is a Communist-infiltrated organization.

(c) Each such petition shall be verified under oath, and shall contain a statement of the facts relied upon in support thereof. Upon the filing of any such petition, the Board shall serve upon each party to such proceeding a notice specifying the time and place for hearing upon such petition. No such hearing shall be conducted within twenty days after the service of such notice.

(d) The provisions of subsections (c) and (d) of section 13 shall apply to hearings conducted under this section, except that upon the failure of any organization named as a party in any petition filed by or duly served upon it pursuant to this section to appear at any hearing upon such petition, the Board may conduct such hearing in the absence of such organization and may enter such order under this section as the Board shall determine to be warranted by evidence presented at such hearing.

(e) In determining whether any organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization, the Board shall consider—

(1) to what extent, if any, the effective management of the affairs of such organization is conducted by one or more individuals who are, or within two years have been, (A) members, agents, or representatives of any Communist organization, and Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, with knowledge of the nature and purpose thereof, or (B) engaged in giving aid or support to any such organization, government, or movement with knowledge of the nature and purpose thereof;

(2) to what extent, if any, the policies of such organization are, or within three years have been, formulated and carried out pursuant to the direction or advice of any member, agent, or representative of any such organization, government, or movement;

(3) to what extent, if any, the personnel and resources of such organization are, or within three years have been, used to further or promote the objectives of any such Communist organization, government, or movement;

(4) to what extent, if any, such organization within three years has received from, or furnished to or for the use of, any such Communist organization, government, or movement any funds or other material assistance;

(5) to what extent, if any, such organization is, or within three years has been, affiliated in any way with any such Communist organization, government, or movement;

(6) to what extent, if any, the affiliation of such organization, or of any individual or individuals who are members thereof or who manage its affairs, with any such Communist organization, government, or movement is concealed from or is not disclosed to the membership of such organization; and

(7) to what extent, if any, such organization or any of its members or managers are, or within three years have been, knowingly engaged—

(A) in any conduct punishable under section 4 or 15 of this Act or under chapter 37, 105, or 115 of title 18 of the United States Code; or

(B) with intent to impair the military strength of the United States or its industrial capacity to furnish logistical or other support required by its armed forces, in any activity resulting in or contributing to any such impairment.

(f) After hearing upon any petition filed under this section, the Board shall (1) make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and its conclusions with respect to the issues presented by such petition, (2) enter its order granting or denying the determination sought by such petition, and (3) serve upon each party to the proceeding a copy of such order. Any order granting any determination on the question whether any organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization shall become final as provided in section 14(b) of this Act.

(g) When any order has been entered by the Board under this section with respect to any labor organization or employer (as these terms are defined by section 2 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and which are organizations within the meaning of section 3 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950), the Board shall serve a true and correct copy of such order upon the National Labor Relations Board and shall publish in the Federal Register a statement of the substance of such order and its effective date.

(h) When there is in effect a final order of the Board determining that any such labor organization is a Communist action organization, a Communist-front organization, or a Communist-infiltrated organization, such labor organization shall be ineligible to—

(1) act as representative of any employee within the meaning or for the purposes of section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (29 U. S. C. 157);

(2) serve as an exclusive representative of employees of any bargaining unit under section 9 of such Act, as amended (29 U. S. C. 159);

(3) make, or obtain any hearing upon, any charge under section 10 of such Act (29 U. S. C. 160); or

(4) exercise any other right or privilege, or receive any other benefit, substantive or procedural, provided by such Act for labor organizations.

(i) When an order of the Board determining that any such labor organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization has become final, and such labor organization theretofore has been certified under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, as a representative of employees in any bargaining unit—

(1) a question of representation affecting commerce, within the meaning of section 9(c) of such Act, shall be deemed to exist with respect to such bargaining unit; and

(2) the National Labor Relations Board, upon petition of not less than 20 per centum of the employees in such bargaining unit or any person or persons acting in their behalf shall under section 9 of such Act (notwithstanding any limitation of time contained therein) direct elections in such bargaining unit or any subdivision thereof (A) for the selection of a representative thereof for collective bargaining purposes, and (B) to determine whether the employees thereof desire to rescind any authority previously granted to such labor organization to enter into any agreement with their employer pursuant to section 8(a) (3)(ii) of such Act.

(j) When there is in effect a final order of the Board determining that any such employer is a Communist-infiltrated organization, such employer shall be ineligible to—

(1) file any petition for an election under section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (29 U. S. C. 157), or participate in any proceeding under such section; or

(2) make or obtain any hearing upon any charge under section 10 of such Act (29 U. S. C. 160); or

JUDICIAL REVIEW

SEC. 14. (a) The party aggrieved by any order entered by the Board under subsection (g), (h), (i), or (j) of section 13, or subsection [14] (f) of section 13A, may obtain a review of such order by filing in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, within sixty days from the date of service upon it of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Board be set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Board, and thereupon the Board shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, including all evidence taken and the report and order of the Board. Thereupon the court shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and shall have power to affirm or set aside the order of the Board; but the court may in its discretion and upon its own motion transfer any action so commenced to the United States Court of Appeals for the circuit wherein the petitioner resides. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by the preponderance of the evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board and to be adduced upon the proceeding in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Board may modify its findings as to the facts, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by the preponderance of the evidence shall be conclusive, and its recommendations, if any, with respect to action in the matter under consideration. If the court shall set aside an order issued under subsection (j) of section 13 it may, in the case of an organization, enter a judgment canceling the registration of such organization and relieving it from the requirement of further annual reports, or in the case of an individual, enter a judgment requiring the Attorney General (A) to strike the name of such individual from the registration statement or annual report on which it appears, or (B) cancel the registration of such individual under section 8, as may be appropriate. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari, as provided in title 28, United States Code, section 1254.

(b) Any order of the Board issued under section 13, or subsection (f) of section 13A,[15] shall become final—

(1) upon the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for review, if no such petition has been duly filed within such time; or

(2) upon the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for certiorari, if the order of the Board has been affirmed or the petition for review dismissed by a United States Court of Appeals, and no petition for certiorari has been duly filed; or

(3) upon the denial of a petition for certiorari, if the order of the Board has been affirmed or the petition for review dismissed by a United States Court of Appeals; or

(4) upon the expiration of ten days from the date of issuance of the mandate of the Supreme Court, if such Court directs that the order of the Board be affirmed or the petition for review dismissed.

PENALTIES

SEC. 15. (a) If there is in effect with respect to any organization or individual a final order of the Board requiring registration under section 7 or section 8 of this title—

(1) such organization shall, upon conviction of failure to register, to file any registration statement or annual report, or to keep records as required by section 7, to be punished for each such offense by a fine of not more than $10,000, and

tion, and each individual having a duty to register under section 8, shall, upon conviction of failure to so register or to file any such registration statement or annual report, be punished for each such offense by a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

For the purposes of this subsection, each day of failure to register, whether on the part of the organization or any individual, shall constitute a separate offense.

(b) Any individual who, in a registration statement or annual report filed under section 7 or section 8, willfully makes any false statement or willfully omits to state any fact which is required to be stated, or which is necessary to make the statements made or information given not misleading, shall upon conviction thereof be punished for each such offense by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment. For the purposes of this subsection—

(1) each false statement willfully made, and each willful omission to state any fact which is required to be stated, or which is necessary to make the statements made or information given not misleading, shall constitute a separate offense; and

(2) each listing of the name or address of any one individual shall be deemed to be a separate statement.

(c) Any organization which violates any provision of section 10 of this title shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each such violation by a fine of not more than $10,000. Any individual who violates any provision of section 5, 6, or 10 of this title shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each such violation by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

APPLICABILITY OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

SEC. 16. Nothing in this title shall be held to make the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act inapplicable to the exercise of functions, or the conduct of proceedings, by the Board under this title.

EXISTING CRIMINAL STATUTES

SEC. 17. The foregoing provisions of this title shall be construed as being in addition to and not in modification of existing criminal statutes.

2. Immigration and Nationality Act

Pertinent provisions of sections 22 and 25 of the Subversive Activities Control Act have been carried forward in the Immigration and Nationality Act, 66 Stat. 163, adopted June 27, 1952, 8 U. S. C., secs. 1182, 1251, 1424, 1451, as follows:

SEC. 212. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the following classes of aliens shall be ineligible to receive visas and shall be excluded from admission into the United States:

* * * * * * *

(28) Aliens who are, or at any time have been, members of any of the following classes:

* * * * * * *

(E) Aliens not within any of the other provisions of this paragraph, who are members of or affiliated with any organization during the time it is registered or required to be registered under section 7 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, unless such aliens establish that they did not have knowledge or reason to believe at the time they became members of or affiliated with such an organization (and did not thereafter and prior to the date upon which such organization was so registered or so required to be registered have such knowledge or reason to believe) that such organization was a Communist organization.

SEC. 241. (a) Any alien in the United States (including any alien crewman) shall, upon the order of the Attorney General, be deported who—

(6) is or at any time has been, after entry, a member of any of the following classes of aliens:

* * * * * * *

(E) Aliens not within any of the other provisions of this paragraph, who are members of or affiliated with any organization during the time it is registered or required to be registered under section 7 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, unless such aliens establish that they did not have knowledge or reason to believe at the time they became members of or affiliated with such organization (and did not thereafter and prior to the date upon which such organization was so registered or so required to be registered have such knowledge or reason to believe) that such organization was a Communist organization.

SEC. 313. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 405(b), no person shall hereafter be naturalized as a citizen of the United States—

(2) . . . (G) who, regardless of whether he is within any of the other provisions of this section, is a member of or affiliated with any Communist-action organization during the time it is registered or required to be registered under the provisions of section 7 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950; or (H) who, regardless of whether he is within any of the other provisions of this section, is a member of or affiliated with any Communist-front organization during the time it is registered or required to be registered under section 7 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, unless such alien establishes that he did not have knowledge or reason to believe at the time he became a member of or affiliated with such an organization (and did not thereafter and prior to the date upon which such organization was so registered or so required to be registered have such knowledge or reason to believe) that such organization was a Communist-front organization.

SEC. 340. * * * (c) If a person who shall have been naturalized after the effective date of this Act [16] shall within five years next following such naturalization become a member of or affiliated with any organization, membership in or affiliation with which at the time of naturalization would have precluded such person from naturalization under the provisions of section 313, it shall be considered prima facie evidence that such person was not attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States and was not well disposed to the good order and happiness of the United States at the time of naturalization, and, in the absence of countervailing evidence, it shall be sufficient in the proper proceeding to authorize the revocation and setting aside of the order admitting such person to citizenship and the cancellation of the certificate of naturalization as having been obtained by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation, and such revocation and setting aside of the order admitting such person to citizenship and such canceling of certificate of naturalization shall be effective as of the original date of the order and certificate, respectively.

V. The original "recess" appointments of the members of the Board present a constitutional question as to their validity which has not been, but should be, determined by this Court.

As we shall show, the presidential "recess" appointments of the five original members of the Board, on October 23, 1950, were invalid because made in violation of art. 2, sec. 2, cl. 3 of the Constitution. There was, therefore, no lawfully constituted Board prior to August 9, 1951, when the Senate confirmed three of the appointees. Consequently, the acts of the alleged Board members prior to that date in denying petitioner's pre-hearing motions (R. 1, n. 1) and in conducting the hearing were nullities.

The facts with reference to the appointments of the Board members were as follows: Congress passed the Act over the President's veto on September 23, 1950 and adjourned on the same day pursuant to a concurrent resolution that it reconvene on November 27, 1950. The President made the "recess" appointments of the alleged Board members on October 23, 1950. On November 27, 1950, he transmitted nominations of these persons to the Senate. On January 2, 1951 the 81st Congress adjourned sine die without acting on the nominations. The nominations were resubmitted to the Senate of the 82nd Congress which took no action upon them until August 9, 1951, when it confirmed three of the appointees (Op. 47).[79]

Art. 2, sec. 2, cl. 3 provides:

> "The President shall have Power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate by granting Commissions which shall expire at the end of their next Session."

[79] One of the other appointees had previously resigned and the nomination of the fifth was never acted upon by the Senate.

The term "vacancies" as used in this clause refers to those occurring by reason of death, resignation, promotion or removal. No vacancy "happens" in the constitutional sense when an office is newly created by law. Moreover, even if the vacancies on the Board "happened," they arose simultaneously with the passage of the Act while the Senate was in session and therefore did not happen "during the Recess." Schenck v. Peay, 21 Fed. Cas. 672; People v. Forquer, 1 Ill. 104; Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, sec. 1559; Cooley, Principles of Constitutional Law, p. 104; Morganston, The Appointing and Removal Power of the President of the United States, Sen. Doc. 172, 70th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 136.[80]

Furthermore, "the Recess," referred to in art. 2, sec. 2, cl. 2, means the recess sine die following an annual or extraordinary session of Congress. It does not include the period following an adjournment to a day certain such as the period of the adjournment of the 81st Congress from September 23 to November 27, 1950. 23 Ops. A.G. 599 (by Attorney General Knox).

Finally, if the adjournment of Congress from September 23 to November 27, 1950 was in fact "the Recess," then the sitting of the Senate that commenced on the latter date must have been its "next Session." Case of the District Attorney, 7 Fed. Cas. 731, 744. Consequently, the appointments expired on January 2, 1951 when the "next session" ended upon the sine die adjournment of the 81st Congress.

The subsequent confirmation of three of the appointments did not cure their original invalidity but simply gave the appointees title to their offices from the date of confirmation. United States v. Kirkpatrick, 6 U. S. 244, 248.

[80] Two opinions of the Attorney General hold that the President has no authority to make recess appointments to newly created offices. 2 Ops. A. G. 333, 4 Ops. A. G. 362. Three opinions hold that he has such authority. 12 Ops. A. G. 455; 18 Ops. A. G. 28; 19 Ops. A. G. 261.

Petitioner asserted the invalidity of the appointments at the inception of this proceeding by a motion addressed to the Board (Tr. 61) and in an injunction proceeding in the District Court. Communist Party of the United States of America v. McGrath, 96 F. Supp. 47, 48. Both the Board (Tr. 113) and the District Court (at 47) denied relief on the grounds of prematurity, holding that the issue should properly await determination upon review of the Board's order.[81]

The court below by-passed the constitutional questions presented by the "recess" appointments on the grounds (1) that the effect of any invalidity was "minimal" because most of the hearing occurred after confirmation, and (2) that in any event the appointees can be regarded as trial examiners (Op. 48).

However, the effect of the invalidity of the appointments cannot be measured by the relative amount of testimony taken before and after confirmation. The court disregarded the fact that key pre-trial motions were denied by the usurpers (Tr. 113-17), who also made precedent-setting rulings on the admissibility of evidence at the inception of the hearing.

The court's suggestion that the unconfirmed appointees can be regarded as trial examiners is palpably untenable in the face of the provisions for the appointment, tenure, compensation and assignment to cases of these officers prescribed by Section 11 of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U. S. C. 1010) and made applicable to this proceeding by Section 16 of the Act.

The effect of the judicial denials of petitioner's initial challenge of the appointments as premature and of its renewed challenge as tardy is to deprive litigants of any remedy against usurpations of administrative office. We submit that the constitutional questions presented are important, novel and appropriately raised[82] and should be reviewed by this Court.

CONCLUSION

This case presents constitutional questions of the utmost importance to the future of the nation. Moreover, the decision below erroneously interprets and applies the Act and contravenes fundamental and long-established principles of law. All of the questions presented demand review by this Court. The writ of certiorari should be granted.

There, the question was raised by habeas corpus, and the matter was disposed of on the ground that title to office cannot be attacked collaterally. Ex Parte Ward, 173 U. S. 452.

APPENDIX B—STATUTES INVOLVED

1. Subversive Activities Control Act.

The Internal Security Act of 1950, 64 Stat. 987, 50 U. S. C. 781 ff., as amended, provides in part as follows:

AN ACT

To protect the United States against certain un-American and subversive activities by requiring registration of Communist organizations, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Internal Security Act of 1950".

TITLE I—SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL

SECTION 1. (a) This title may be cited as the "Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950."

(b) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize, require, or establish military or civilian censorship or in any way to limit or infringe upon freedom of the press or of speech as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and no regulation shall be promulgated hereunder having that effect.

NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATION

SEC. 2. As a result of evidence adduced before various committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, the Congress hereby finds that—

(1) There exists a world Communist movement which, in its origins, its development, and its present practice, is a world-wide revolutionary movement

whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization.

(2) The establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship in any country results in the suppression of all opposition to the party in power, the subordination of the rights of individuals to the state, the denial of fundamental rights and liberties which are characteristic of a representative form of government, such as freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, and of religious worship, and results in the maintenance of control over the people through fear, terrorism, and brutality.

(3) The system of government known as a totalitarian dictatorship is characterized by the existence of a single political party, organized on a dictatorial basis, and by substantial identity between such party and its policies and the government and governmental policies of the country in which it exists.

(5) The Communist dictatorship of such foreign country, in exercising such direction and control and in furthering the purposes of the world Communist movement, establishes or causes the establishment of, and utilizes, in various countries, action organizations which are not free and independent organizations, but are sections of a world-wide Communist organization and are controlled, directed, and subject to the discipline of the Communist dictatorship of such foreign country.

(6) The Communist action organizations so established and utilized in various countries, acting under such control, direction, and discipline, endeavor to carry out the objective of the world Communist movement by bringing about the overthrow of existing governments by any available means, including force if necessary, and setting up Communist totalitarian dictatorships which will be subservient to the most powerful existing Communist totalitarian dictatorship. Although such organizations usually designate themselves as political parties, they are in fact constituent elements of the world-wide Communist movement and promote the objectives of such movement by conspiratorial and coercive tactics, instead of through the democratic processes of a free elective system or through the freedom-preserving means employed by a political party which operates as ~~an~~ agency by which people govern themselves.

(7) In carrying on the activities referred to in paragraph (6), such Communist organizations in various countries are organized on a secret, conspiratorial basis and operate to a substantial extent through organizations, commonly known as "Communist fronts", which in most instances are created and maintained, or used, in such manner as to conceal the facts as to their true character and purposes and their membership. One result of this method of operation is that such affiliated organizations are able to obtain financial and other support from persons who would not extend such support if they knew the true purposes of, and the actual nature of the control and influence exerted upon, such "Communist fronts".

(8) Due to the nature and scope of the world Communist movement, with the existence of affiliated constituent elements working toward common objectives in various countries of the world, travel of Communist members, representatives, and agents from country to country facilitates communication and is a prerequisite for the carrying on of activities to further the purposes of the Communist movement.

(9) In the United States those individuals who knowingly and willfully participate in the world Communist movement, when they so participate, in effect repudiate their allegiance to the United States, and in effect transfer their allegiance to the foreign country in which is vested the direction and control of the world Communist movement.

(10) In pursuance of communism's stated objectives, the most powerful existing Communist dictatorship has, by the methods referred to above, already caused the establishment in numerous foreign countries of Communist totalitarian dictatorships, and threatens to establish similar dictatorships in still other countries.

(12) The Communist network in the United States is inspired and controlled in large part by foreign agents who are sent into the United States ostensibly as attaches of foreign legations, affiliates of international organizations, members of trading commissions, and in similar capacities, but who use their diplomatic or semidiplomatic status as a shield behind which to engage in activities prejudicial to the public security.

(13) There are, under our present immigration laws, numerous aliens who have been found to be deportable, many of whom are in the subversive, criminal, or immoral classes who are free to roam the country at will without supervision or control.

(14) One device for infiltration by Communists is by procuring naturalization for disloyal aliens who use their citizenship as a badge for admission into the fabric of our society.

(15) The Communist movement in the United States is an organization numbering thousands of adherents, rigidly and ruthlessly disciplined. Awaiting and seeking to advance a moment when the United States may be so far extended by foreign engagements, so far divided in counsel, or so far in industrial or financial straits, that overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence may seem possible of achievement, it seeks converts far and wide by an extensive system of schooling and indoctrination. Such preparation by Communist organizations in other countries have aided in supplanting existing governments. The Communist organization in the United States, pursuing its stated objectives, the recent successes of Communist methods in other countries, and the nature and control of the world Communist movement itself, present a clear and present danger to the security of the United States and to the existence of free American institutions, and make it necessary that Congress, in order to provide for the common defense, to preserve the sovereignty of the United States as an independent nation, and to guarantee to each State a republican form of government, enact appropriate legislation recognizing the existence of such world-wide conspiracy and designed to prevent it from accomplishing its purpose in the United States.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this title—

(1) The term "person" means an individual or an organization.

(2) The term "organization" means an organization, corporation, company, partnership, association, trust, foundation, or fund; and includes a group of persons, whether or not incorporated, permanently or temporarily associated together for joint action on any subject or subjects.

(3) The term "Communist-action organization" means—

(a) any organization in the United States (other than a diplomatic representative or mission of a foreign government accredited as such by the Department of State) which (i) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, and (ii) operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement as referred to in section 2 of this title; and

(b) any section, branch, fraction, or cell of any organization defined in subparagraph (a) of this paragraph which has not complied with the registration requirements of this title.

(4A) The term "Communist-infiltrated organization" means any organization in the United States (other than a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization) which (A) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by an individual or individuals who are, or who within three years have been actively engaged in, giving aid or support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, and (B) is serving, or within three years has served, as a means for (i) the giving of aid or support to any such organization, government, or movement, or (ii) the impairment of the military strength of the United States or its industrial capacity to furnish logistical or other material support required by its Armed Forces: Provided, however, That any labor organization which is an affiliate in good standing of a national federation or other labor organization whose policies and activities have been directed to opposing Communist organizations, any Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement, shall be presumed prima facie not to be a "Communist-infiltrated organization."[1]

(5) The term "Communist organization" means any Communist-action organization, Communist-front organization, or Communist-infiltrated organization.[2]

(6) The term "to contribute funds or services" includes the rendering of any personal service and the making of any gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit, of money or of anything of value, and also the making of any contract, promise, or agreement to contribute funds or services, whether or not legally enforcible.

(7) The term "facility" means any plant, factory or other manufacturing, producing or service establishment, airport, airport facility, vessel, pier, water-front facility, mine, railroad, public utility, laboratory, station, or other establishment or facility, or any part, division, or department of any of the foregoing. The term "defense facility" means any facility designated and proclaimed by the Secretary of Defense pursuant to section 5(b) of this title and included on the list published and currently in effect under such subsection, and which is in compliance with the provisions of such subsection respecting the posting of notice of such designation.

(8) The term "publication" means any circular, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, book, letter, post card, leaflet, or other publication.

(9) The term "United States", when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States, Territories, and possessions of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Canal Zone.

(10) The term "interstate or foreign commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication (A) between any State, Territory, or possession of the United States (including the Canal Zone), or the District of Columbia, and any place outside thereof; or (B) within any Territory or possession of the United States (including the Canal Zone), or within the District of Columbia.

(11) The term "Board" means the Subversive Activities Control Board created by section 12 of this title.

(12) The term "final order of the Board" means an order issued by the Board under section 13 of this title, which has become final as provided in section 14 of this title.

(13) The term "advocates" includes advises, recommends, furthers by overt act, and admits belief in; and the giving, loaning, or promising of support or of money or anything of value to be used for advocating any doctrine shall be deemed to constitute the advocating of such doctrine.

(14) The term "world communism" means a revolutionary movement, the purpose of which is to establish eventually a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in any or all the countries of the world through the medium of an internationally coordinated Communist movement.

(15) The terms "totalitarian dictatorship" and "totalitarianism" mean and refer to systems of government not representative in fact, characterized by (A) the existence of a single political party, organized on a dictatorial basis, with so close an identity between such party and its policies and the governmental policies of the country in which it exists, that the party and the government constitute an indistinguishable unit, and (B) the forcible suppression of opposition to such party.

(16) The term "doctrine" includes, but is not limited to, policies, practices, purposes, aims, or procedures.

(17) The giving, loaning, or promising of support or of money or any other thing of value for any purpose to any organization shall be conclusively presumed to constitute affiliation therewith; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as an exclusive definition of affiliation.

(18) "Advocating the economic, international, and governmental doctrines of world communism" means advocating the establishment of a totalitarian Communist dictatorship in any or all of the countries of the world through the medium of an internationally coordinated Communist movement.

(19) "Advocating the economic and governmental doctrines of any other form of totalitarianism" means advocating the establishment of totalitarianism (other than world communism) and includes, but is not limited to, advocating the economic and governmental doctrines of fascism and nazism.

CERTAIN PROHIBITED ACTS

SEC. 4. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person knowingly to combine, conspire, or agree with any other person to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship, as defined in paragraph (15) of section 3 of this title, the direction and control of which is to be vested in, or exercised by or under the domination or control of, any foreign government, foreign organization, or foreign individual: Provided, however, That this subsection shall not apply to the proposal of a constitutional amendment.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States or of any department or agency thereof, or of any corporation the stock of which is owned in whole or in major part by the United States or any department or agency thereof, to communicate in any manner or by any means, to any other person whom such officer or employee knows or has reason to believe to be an agent or representative of any foreign government or an officer or member of any Communist organization as defined in paragraph (5) of section 3 of this title, any information of a kind which shall have been classified by the President (or by the head of any such department, agency, or corporation with the approval of the President) as affecting the security of the United States, knowing or having reason to know that such information has been so classified, unless such officer or employee shall have been specifically authorized by the President, or by the head of the department, agency, or corporation by which this officer or employee is employed, to make such disclosure of such information.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any agent or representative of any foreign government, or any officer or member of any Communist organization as defined in paragraph (5) of section 3 of this title, knowingly to obtain or receive, or attempt to obtain or receive, directly or indirectly, from

3. The Communist Control Act of 1954

The Communist Control Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 775, 50 U. S. C. 481-44, provides in part as follows:

FINDINGS OF FACT

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby finds and declares that the Communist Party of the United States, although purportedly a political party, is in fact an instrumentality of a conspiracy to overthrow the Government of the United States. It constitutes an authoritarian dictatorship within a republic, demanding for itself the rights and privileges accorded to political parties, but denying to all others the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution. Unlike political parties, which evolve their policies and programs through public means, by the reconciliation of a wide variety of individual views, and submit those policies and programs to the electorate at large for approval or disapproval, the policies and programs of the Communist Party are secretly prescribed for it by the foreign leaders of the world Communist movement. Its members have no part in determining its goals, and are not permitted to voice dissent to party objectives. Unlike members of political parties, members of the Communist Party are recruited for indoctrination with respect to its objectives and methods, and are organized, instructed, and disciplined to carry into action slavishly the assignments given them by their hierarchical chieftains. Unlike political parties, the Communist Party acknowledges no constitutional or statutory limitations upon its conduct or upon that of its members. The Communist Party is relatively small numerically, and gives scant indication of capacity ever to attain its ends by lawful political means. The peril inherent in its operation arises not from its numbers, but from its failure to acknowledge any limitation as to the nature of its activities, and its dedication to the proposition that the present constitutional Government of the United States ultimately must be brought to ruin by any available means, including resort to force and violence. Holding that doctrine, its role as the agency of a hostile foreign power renders its existence a clear present and continuing danger to the security of the United States. It is the means whereby individuals are seduced into the service of the world Communist movement, trained to do its bidding, and directed and controlled in the conspiratorial performance of their revolutionary services. Therefore, the Communist Party should be outlawed.

PROSCRIBED ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 3. The Communist Party of the United States, or any successors of such party regardless of the assumed name, whose object or purpose is to overthrow the Government of the United States, or the government of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, or the government of any political subdivision therein by force and violence, are not entitled to any of the rights, privileges, and immunities attendant upon legal bodies created under the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States or any political subdivision thereof; and whatever rights, privileges, and immunities which have heretofore been granted to said party or any subsidiary organization by reason of the laws of the United States or any political subdivision thereof, are hereby terminated: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall be construed as amending the Internal Security Act of 1950, as amended.

SEC. 4. Whoever knowingly and willfully becomes or remains a member of (1) the Communist Party, or (2) any other organization having for one of its purposes or objectives the establishment, control conduct, seizure, or overthrow of the Government of the United States, or the government of any State or political subdivision thereof, by the use of force or violence, with knowledge of the purpose or objective of such organization shall be subject to all the provisions and penalties of the Internal Security Act of 1950, as amended, as a member of a "Communist-action" organization.

(b) For the purposes of this section, the term "Communist Party" means the organization now known as the Communist Party of the United States of America, the Communist Party of any State or subdivision thereof, and any unit or subdivision of any such organization, whether or not any change is hereafter made in the name thereof.

SEC. 5. In determining membership or participation in the Communist Party or any other organization defined in this Act, or knowledge of the purpose or objective of such party or organization, the jury, under instructions from the court, shall consider evidence, if presented, as to whether the accused person:

(1) Has been listed to his knowledge as a member in any book or any of the lists, records, correspondence, or any other document of the organization;

(2) Has made financial contribution to the organization in dues, assessments, loans, or in any other form;

(3) Has made himself subject to the discipline of the organization in any form whatsoever;

(4) Has executed orders, plans, or directives of any kind of the organization;

(5) Has acted as an agent, courier, messenger, correspondent, organizer, or in any other capacity in behalf of the organization;

(6) Has conferred with officers or other members of the organization in behalf of any plan or enterprise of the organization;

(7) Has been accepted to his knowledge as an officer or member of the organization or as one to be called upon for services by other officers or members of the organization;

(8) Has written, spoken or in any other way communicated by signal, semaphore, sign, or in any other form of communication orders, directives, or plans of the organization;

(9) Has prepared documents, pamphlets, leaflets, books, or any other type of publication in behalf of the objectives and purposes of the organization;

(10) Has mailed, shipped, circulated, distributed, delivered, or in any other way sent or delivered to others material or propaganda of any kind in behalf of the organization;

(11) Has advised, counseled or in any other way imparted information, suggestions, recommendations to officers or members of the organization or to anyone else in behalf of the objectives of the organization;

(12) Has indicated by word, action, conduct, writing or in any other way a willingness to carry out in any manner and to any degree the plans, designs, objectives, or purposes of the organization;

(13) Has in any other way participated in the activities, planning, actions, objectives, or purposes of the organization;

(14) The enumeration of the above subjects of evidence on membership or participation in the Communist Party or any other organization as above defined, shall not limit the inquiry into and consideration of any other subject of evidence on membership and participation as herein stated.

* * * * * * [17]

SEC. 12. If any provision of this title or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the title, and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

Supreme Court of the United States

No. 48

COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Petitioner,

v.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR PETITIONER

Opinions Below

The opinion of the Court of Appeals has not yet been reported. It appears at R. 2078.[1] The Report of the Subversive Activities Control Board (hereafter called the Board) has been published as Sen. Doc. No. 41, 83d Cong., 1st Sess. It appears at R. 1.

[1] "R." refers to the printed record. "Tr." refers to the transcript of the proceedings before the Board, which has been filed with the Court by order of the court below and pursuant to Rule 21(3). "A.G. Ex." refers to an exhibit offered by the Attorney General in the proceeding before the Board. "C.P. Ex." refers to an exhibit offered in that proceeding by the petitioner herein.

Jurisdiction

The Court has jurisdiction under section 14(a) of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950,[2] 64 Stat. 987, 1001, 50 U. S. Code, sec. 793(a), and 28 U. S. Code, sec. 1254.

Statutes Involved

The pertinent provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act, as amended, the Immigration and Nationality Act, and the Communist Control Act of 1954, are set forth in the Appendix.

Questions Presented

1. Whether the provisions of the Act relating to Communist-action organizations and their members, by themselves and as supplemented by section 5 of the Communist Control Act, are unconstitutional on their face or as applied in this case.

2. Whether the Board and the court below erroneously interpreted and applied the evidentiary criteria of section 13(c) of the Act.

3. Whether the order of the Board and the decision below are erroneous because they rest on alleged conduct of petitioner which admittedly had been discontinued prior to the enactment of the Act.

4. Whether the Board and the court below applied the Act in violation of the First Amendment.

5. Whether the court below, having set aside or invalidated key findings on which the Board based its order, erred in failing to remand the proceeding for administrative redetermination.

6. Whether petitioner was denied a fair hearing because the members of the Board were subjected to and influenced by extra-legal pressures to decide against it, and because of the refusal of the Board to disqualify two of its members upon petitioner's affidavits of bias and prejudice.

7. Whether the order of the Board should have been set aside because the administrative hearing was conducted in part by "recess" appointees whose appointments were invalid or had expired under article 2, section 2, clause 3 of the Constitution.

8. Whether it appears from the face of the Report of the Board and the decision below that the findings of the Board were not supported by the preponderance of the evidence.

9. Whether the court below and the Board erroneously interpreted and applied the Act's definition of "world Communist movement".

10. Whether the findings and order of the Board are unsupported by the preponderance of the evidence.

11. Whether the denial by the court below of petitioner's motion to adduce additional evidence violated section 14 of the Act and was an abuse of discretion.

Preliminary Statement

This case presents for review a decision of the Court of Appeals (Judge Bazelon dissenting) affirming an order of the Board that the petitioner register as a Communist-action organization under section 7 of the Act. It raises questions of first impression concerning the constitutionality of the Act and its application by the Board and the court below.

These questions are of far-reaching public importance. The Act imposes an unparalleled regimentation of speech, press and assembly. It establishes a pervasive censorship over all dissenting expression. It suppresses voluntary association and collective activity for constitutionally protected objectives. It outlaws organizations for peaceful political opposition. It denies individuals their livelihood and otherwise punishes them for innocent association. It prohibits foreign travel and penalizes communication abroad for lawful purposes. In the name of anti-Communism, it is an enabling act for the establishment of a totalitarian state.

Inevitably, the Act employs police state techniques to achieve its police state objective. It revives the despotic principle of legislative determination of guilt. It establishes arbitrary and irrational standards of proof. It provides for adjudication by a biased administrative tribunal whose sole function is to implement the predetermined verdict. It coerces self-incrimination.

The impact of the Act as a whole upon American liberties is greater than its separate invasions of constitutional rights. In the totality of its provisions, the Act has no legislative counterpart in our history. Ostensibly, its target is the Communist Party and the system of political thought which it represents. But Communists are only its first victims. The Act authorizes the proscription of every organization which does not conform to authoritarian standards of political orthodoxy, and the punishment of its members as heretics. Its terms and the principles which it establishes deny the protection of the First Amendment to all Americans and impose a system of thought control upon the whole people.

The police state character of the Act has been widely recognized. For more than two years, popular opposition blocked the enactment of proposals for such legislation advanced by the House Committee on Un-American Activities.[3]

President Truman sharply condemned the Act, first in a message to the Congress while it was being debated, and then in a veto message. Nevertheless, Congress passed the Act over the President's veto in the repressive atmosphere which accompanied the outbreak of the Korean War.

In his first message, the President stated (H. R. Doc. No. 679, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 5-6):

> "Once a government is committed to the principle of silencing the voice of opposition, it has only one way to go, and that is down the path of increasingly repressive measures, until it becomes a source of terror to all its citizens and creates a country where everyone lives in fear.
> "We must, therefore, be on our guard against extremists who urge us to adopt police state measures. Such persons advocate breaking down the guarantees of the Bill of Rights in order to get at the Communists. They forget that if the Bill of Rights were to be broken down, all groups, even the most conservative, would be in danger from the arbitrary power of the government.

[3] The opponents included the A.F. of L., C.I.O., Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, National Farmers Union, Society of Friends, American Unitarian Association, National Fraternal Council of Negro Churches, American Civil Liberties Union, Americans for Democratic Action, American Association of University Professors, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Council for Social Action of Congregational Christian Churches, United Council of Church Women, American Jewish Congress, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, National Council of Jewish Women, American Veterans Committee, National Community Relations Advisory Council, many distinguished individuals, more than twenty major newspapers, and numerous local groups. Hearings before House Committee on Un-American Activities, H.R., 81st Cong., 2d Sess., on H.R. 3903 and 7595; Hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, Sen., 80th Cong., 2d Sess., on H.R. 5852; Cong. Rec. 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pp. A6135, A6220-21, A6724-26, A7397, A7266, A7275-81; see R. 185.

> "Legislation is now pending before the Congress which is so broad and vague in its terms as to endanger the freedoms of speech, press and assembly protected by the first amendment. Some of the proposed measures would, in effect, impose severe penalties for normal political activities on the part of certain groups, including Communists and Communist Party-line followers. This kind of legislation is unnecessary, ineffective, and dangerous."

In his veto message, the President added (H. R. Doc. No. 708, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 5):

> "Unfortunately, these [registration] provisions are not merely ineffective and unworkable. They represent a clear and present danger to our institutions."

This proceeding directly involves the constitutional rights of Communists. But, as the President said in his veto message (id., pp. 6-7):

> "Obviously, if this law were on the statute books, the part of prudence would be to avoid saying anything that might be construed by someone as not deviating sufficiently from the current Communist-propaganda line. And since no one could be sure in advance what views were safe to express, the inevitable tendency would be to express no views on controversial subjects."

Events since the passage of the Act have more than confirmed the fears expressed by President Truman. The anti-Communist drive of which the Act is a part has not only claimed thousands of non-Communists as its immediate victims, but is devastating freedom of expression and association for all.

The Board's application of the Act magnified its unconstitutional features and set a pattern for the wholesale repression of American liberties.

The disposition of this case will determine whether traditional American liberties, already severely restricted, will survive.

Statement of the Case

The Act was enacted on September 23, 1950. On November 22, 1950, the Attorney General filed with the Board a petition for a registration order against the petitioner herein (R. 143). Evidence was taken before a panel of Board members, originally three in number, reduced to two when Congress adjourned without action on the nomination of the panel chairman (R. 1).

On April 20, 1953, the Board issued its order (R. 138) and an accompanying Report (R. 1) in which, as required by section 13(j) of the Act, it stated its findings. In the Report, the Board made findings adverse to the petitioner herein under each of the eight standards provided by section 13(e) of the Act as a guide to Board decision. On the totality of these findings, the Board made its ultimate finding that the petitioner herein is a Communist-action organization as defined by section 3(3) of the Act.

We discuss the evidence and the findings of the Board at appropriate points in the argument (infra, Parts Two and Four).

In the course of the argument we also discuss the pressures exerted on the Board by the Senate Judiciary Committee and the refusal of the Board to disqualify two Board members on affidavits of bias and prejudice, filed by petitioner in accordance with section 7(a) of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U. S. C. 1006(a), made applicable to the proceeding by section 16 of the Act. (See infra, pp. 178-85.)

The court below set aside two of the eight key findings on which the Board had based its order on the ground that they were not supported by a preponderance of the evidence. Moreover, under the court's interpretation of the Act, the Board made erroneous use of a third key finding. (See infra, pp. 175-77.) Nevertheless, the court affirmed the Board's order.

While the proceeding was pending before the court below, petitioner moved pursuant to section 14 of the Act for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board. By this motion petitioner offered to prove that subsequent to the conclusion of the proceeding before the Board two of the Attorney General's principal witnesses had committed perjury in other proceedings; that a third had admitted a course of perjury; and that public disclosures of their untrustworthiness had caused the Attorney General to cease to employ these persons as witnesses. The motion was denied by the court without opinion, Judge Bazelon not participating. (See infra, pp. 212-16.)

Summary of Argument

ONE

The Act is unconstitutional on its face.

I. A. The Act is an outlawry statute, not a disclosure measure. It inflicts intolerably severe sanctions and consequences upon an organization ordered to register and upon its members. It requires the organization to defame itself and its members as participants in a foreign-controlled seditious conspiracy and quarantines them. The members are deprived of rights to public and private employment, of naturalized citizenship, and of the right to travel abroad. These sanctions apply whether or not registration occurs. Registration is incompatible with survival and, moreover, is made impossible by the vague and loose definition of "membership" in petitioner contained in section 5 of the Communist Control Act. Failure to register, however, is punishable by severe criminal penalties. Thus the effect of a registration order is to destroy or outlaw the organization whether or not it attempts to comply with the registration requirement.

The Act is not, and was not meant to be, a disclosure statute. Disclosure legislation does not impose destructive penalties on those who comply by registering, nor does it make registration a self-exposure to onerous criminal and civil penalties created by the legislation itself.

B. 1. The legislative history of the Act shows that it was intended to outlaw petitioner as a criminal organization without proof that it is such. The legislative history shows:

(a) The sponsors of the legislation intended to outlaw petitioner (and subsequently other organizations) by requiring it to register as a seditious foreign agent.

(b) There already existed laws requiring foreign agents and seditious organizations to register, as well as punishing seditious activity and advocacy. But these laws could not serve the purpose because they required proof of violation. Such proof, as the authors of the legislation, the Congressional committees, and the Attorney General were aware and stated, was not available against petitioner.

(c) On the other hand, the sponsors of the legislation recognized that it would be unconstitutional for a law to specify the petitioner by name as an organization required to register as a seditious foreign agent.

The Act represents the sponsors' attempt to resolve this dilemma. In order to avoid its first horn—the invalidity of a legislative verdict of guilt against petitioner by name—the Act provides that the identity of the guilty organization shall be determined administratively. In order to avoid the second horn—the absence of evidence of guilt—the Act rigs the administrative procedure by three devices: (1) it predetermines the case by legislatively making the findings of fact prerequisite to entry of a registration order against petitioner; (2) it sets up vague and irrational standards of proof for the administrative adjudication; (3) it creates as the adjudicative body a Board which is necessarily biased against petitioner and has an interest in deciding against it.

2. The predetermination device has three aspects.

Under section 3(3), a Communist-action organization is defined as one which (a) is substantially controlled by the foreign power which controls "the world Communist movement referred to in section 2" and (b) operates primarily to advance the objectives of that movement "as referred to in section 2." Accordingly, there can be a Communist-action organization only if there is a world Communist movement of the character described in section 2. However, as the court below held and the Board conceded, neither the Board nor the reviewing court is authorized to determine the existence and nature of such a movement. Instead, these "facts" are found legislatively in section 2 and are then incorporated into section 3(3) as assumptions of fact which the Board and the courts must accept. Moreover, these essential "facts" are also presupposed by the criteria of section 13(e), which the Board is obliged to apply in making its decision.

Secondly, section 2 makes findings on other elements of the section 3(3) definition. These include findings that there is a Communist-action organization in the United States, that "the Communist movement in the United States" is that organization, and that it has characteristics which delineate a Communist-action organization under the criteria of section 13(e). The Board could not make contrary determinations without overruling Congress and the findings which justify the Board's creation.

Thirdly, Congress even predetermined the specific identification of petitioner as the domestic Communist-action organization. This appears from the debates and the reports and from the fact that the section 2 description of the Communist-action organization in the United States contains verbatim excerpts from Judge Hand's description of petitioner in the Dennis case. This Court in Carlson v. Landon held that section 2 refers to petitioner.

3. The device of irrational and vague standards is employed in section 13(e), which provides eight criteria for the Board to consider in making its decision. As the court below held and the Board admitted, none of these criteria (which were the only ones applied by the Board) is relevant to the objectives component of section 3(3)—i.e., that a Communist-action organization advances the objectives attributed by section 2 to the world Communist movement, all of which are seditious. The 13(e) criteria do not call for proof that the organization advances any seditious objectives, much less those specific seditious objectives attributed to the world Communist movement. As to the foreign control component of the section 3(3) definition, the tests supplied by 13(e) are nebulous, circumstantial, and largely irrelevant. This becomes plain when each is examined.

Section 13(e) thus perverts the function of the orthodox legislative enumeration of guides for administrative determination. Instead of giving more definite content to a generalized ultimate standard, it unsettles the definite ultimate standard of section 3(3) and authorizes petitioner's conviction of one thing on proof of another.

4. The third device of the Act is its creation of a Board which is necessarily biased against petitioner and whose members have a personal interest, financial and otherwise, in deciding against petitioner.

The Board's sole function is to identify Communist-action organizations, their members, Communist-front organizations, and (since enactment of the Communist Control Act) Communist-infiltrated organizations. By definition, there can be no front or infiltrated organizations in the absence of an action organization. The only Communist-action organization envisaged by the Act is the petitioner, as both the Attorney General and the Board have recognized. The Board, therefore, could not decide in favor of petitioner without rendering itself functus officio, and, in effect, repealing the Act. Irresistible pressure was thus generated by the Act upon the agency to decide in the only way which would preserve the Act and the agency—i.e., against petitioner.

Moreover, the members of the Board had a personal interest in ruling against petitioner so as to preserve further business for themselves. By ruling otherwise they would lose their jobs, salaries, and appointment patronage. The Board's staff had a similar job interest in seeing that the order was adverse to petitioner.

II. The Act violates the due process prohibition against fiat legislation. Since the order of the Board deprives petitioner and its members of liberty and property it may not constitutionally be entered without a hearing. If any of the elements requisite to a determination of liability are found legislatively, rather than in the hearing, due process is violated. The Act contravenes this principle of due process in two respects.

First, as was decided below and conceded by the Board, there has been a legislative predetermination of the existence, objectives and nature of the world Communist movement, which is binding on the Board and the courts. Under section 3(3), the facts concerning the world Communist movement are adjudicative facts essential to proof of the ultimate issue. Therefore due process requires that petitioner be allowed to litigate these facts. Yet the Act precludes it from doing so.

Secondly, as already seen, the Act not only legally predetermines the facts concerning the world Communist movement, but also finds the existence of a domestic organization having the characteristics of a Communist-action organization and identifies petitioner as that organization. While findings as to these facts are ostensibly left to administrative determination, obviously the Board is under compelling pressure not to overrule the Congressional findings. In fact, therefore, the Act removes these issues from independent adjudication. Hence due process is violated in this respect as well.

III. The Act is invalid as a bill of attainder, which is by definition a legislative act inflicting punishment without a judicial trial. This is true even disregarding the fact that the Act by legislative fiat determines petitioner's guilt and identifies petitioner and its members as objects of its sanctions. The Act gives only an administrative hearing, not a judicial trial. Administrative hearings satisfy constitutional requisites for the purpose of "regulation", but a judicial hearing is a constitutional prerequisite to the infliction of "punishment". The Act is, therefore, a bill of attainder if it "inflicts punishment".

The Act and the registration order do impose "punishment", as distinguished from "regulation", on the organization and its members, who are identified by the registration order. Since the Act makes registration an impossible course, there can be no "regulation" through disclosure. The cumulative impact of the the Act prevents an organization ordered to register from engaging in any activity, however, innocent, and does not merely confine it to non-deleterious conduct. It imposes a death sentence, and this is obviously penal. The sanctions against the organization and its members, when examined individually, are also of a punitive, not regulatory, nature. Their sole function is to inflict injury rather than to serve a public interest by restricting activity to permissible limitations, and the disabilities imposed on members have no reasonable relation to the fitness of the members to utilize or enjoy the privileges of which they are deprived.

IV. Section 13(e) establishes rules of evidence which authorize the Board to infer that an organization is a Communist-action organization from the fact that it engages in some or all of eight practices. As already seen, these practices are not relevant to the ultimate issues defined by section 3(3). The presumptions established by 13(e) therefore violate due process.

Congress' power to prescribe rules of evidence and presumptions is limited by the due process principles that there must be a rational connection between the fact to be proved and the fact presumed, and that the presumption must not be conclusive. The Act violates both these principles. The Act is invalid if only because of the single irrationality that although one component of the section 3(3) definition is that a Communist-action organization advances the seditious objectives attributed by section 2 to the world Communist movement, section 13(c) admittedly authorizes issuance of a registration order without any proof that the accused organization promotes those objectives.

In addition, the vagueness of section 13(c) permits decision according to the subjective prejudices of the Board, and thus violates due process and constitutes an invalid delegation of legislative power.

V. As already seen, the Board could not have decided in favor of petitioner without rendering itself funcius officio and, in effect, repealing the Act. Moreover, the Board members had a job interest in ruling against petitioner. The Act thus violates the due process requirements of a fair hearing, before an impartial tribunal, which has no interest in the event.

VI. The Act imposes severe sanctions and disabilities on petitioner's members. Since these directly affect and injure petitioner, petitioner has standing to challenge their constitutionality.

The sanctions on the members violate due process because (1) they are imposed for association, not for personal misconduct; (2) they apply regardless of the individuals' lack of knowledge of the organization's claimed illicit purposes; (3) they establish a conclusive disqualification and do not permit a member to prove that he is a fit person to enjoy the privileges of which he is deprived; (4) they are arbitrary and have no real and substantial relation to any legitimate federal objective.

VII. If the Board's order becomes final, petitioner and its officers must determine the names of petitioner's members in order to list them in the registration statement required by the Act. Other persons must determine whether they are members of petitioner in order to know whether they may lawfully hold certain jobs, apply for passports, and obtain naturalization, and whether they must register themselves upon failure of the organization to list their names in a registration statement.

If criminal liability is to be avoided, those required to determine membership must do so in accordance with section 5 of the Communist Control Act, which sets forth the criteria for determining membership in petitioner. Section 5, however, prescribes such vague and irrational criteria that it is impossible for petitioner, its officers or others to determine the identity of petitioner's "members". Moreover, the application of these criteria requires a knowledge of facts which petitioner and its officers cannot have or obtain. These facts clearly appear from examination of section 5 as a whole and of the criteria separately.

Section 5 thus unsettles and invalidates the Act as a whole, including the registration requirements.

VIII. The Act violates the privilege against self-incrimination since a registration order against petitioner compels admissions of membership or office-holding in the Communist Party and of participation in the alleged criminal conspiracy described in section 2 of the Act.

The immunity conferred by section 4(f) does not extend to all matters which the compelled admissions in a registration statement concern. Hence the immunity is not coextensive with the constitutional privilege and cannot save the Act.

The rule that the privilege is not available against compulsion to produce an organization's records does not apply. The Act requires the preparation and filing of original statements. These statements need not even be derived from records. Furthermore, the rule as to records applies where incrimination may result from the contents of the records. Here the incriminating admission consists in the act of signing the registration statement, which identifies the signer as an officer of petitioner.

Adjudication of the question of privilege is not premature in this proceeding. It cannot await an assertion of the privilege by petitioner's officers, for the Act allows them no opportunity or place to assert the privilege prior to prosecution for not registering. Furthermore, a claim of the privilege in advance of prosecution would itself be incriminating by identifying the claimant as an officer of petitioner. If the privilege, as it must, is to be available against prosecution as well as conviction, this proceeding provides the only opportunity for its assertion.

IX. The most fundamental vice of the Act is its violation of the First Amendment.

A. A statute penalizing conduct outside of the area protected by the First Amendment may not be so broad as to abridge protected expression or assembly as well. The Act infringes this principle of economy. Its controls are not limited to the regulation or exposure of the alleged seditious and criminal activity described in section 2. Instead, it suppresses all of petitioner's activity, including its admittedly extensive peaceable advocacy and assembly. It is precisely such protected conduct and expression which the Act is designed to reach.

The Act also violates the principle that government may not intervene in the political process by imposing special disabilities on any political group.

The constitutional principles which the Act violates have been applied specifically to the Communist Party and its members, in holdings of the Court that peaceable assembly and advocacy of Communists could not be abridged even if it were assumed that the Party engaged in illicit advocacy and activity.

The invalidity of the Act was foreshadowed by American Communications Association v. Douds, which recognizes that Congress may not outlaw petitioner or impose onerous burdens on membership in it.

The Act is not rescued by the section 2 finding that "the Communist organization in the United States * * * presents a clear and present danger." Determination of a clear and present danger is a judicial function, to be made on a case by case basis in the light of the particular expression and the circumstances of its utterance. Legislation of a future, permanent clear and present danger is a contradiction in terms. Furthermore, the clear and present danger exception is confined to advocacy within the exception. It cannot be applied to an organization as a whole, so as thereby to allow suppression of its peaceable advocacy.

Even if the major sanctions of the Act are abstracted from their setting, each violates the First Amendment. The government employment sanction applies to non-sensitive jobs and excludes considerations of scienter, personal innocence and fitness. The sanction with respect to employment in "defense facilities" has the same defects. It is also invalid because it delegates unfettered and unreviewable authority to the Secretary of Defense to designate any private enterprise as a "defense facility". The provision that it is unlawful for employees of the government or of "defense facilities" to contribute to a Communist organization applies without regard to the purpose or use of the contribution, and prohibits subscription to any publication of the organization regardless of the publication's nature and contents. The sanction against trade-union employment is not limited to the area of interstate commerce and applies to non-sensitive and even menial jobs. The passport sanction prohibits travel for legitimate purposes. The denaturalization sanction causes forfeiture of citizenship solely for association, no matter how innocent. The provision requiring labelling of mail and broadcasts abridges press and speech regardless of the content of the expression.

B. The Act imposes a prior restraint on First Amendment rights by requiring registration and labelling as a condition to the exercise of rights of advocacy, press, and assembly. This is clearly invalid under Thomas v. Collins.

The registration statement requires a public listing of members. Yet anonymity of membership in unpopular groups, and especially in minority parties, is indispensable to freedom of political action. Subjection of a minority party to discriminatory "disclosure" requirements destroys the electoral process.

C. The Act also violates the First Amendment because it imposes its sanctions on the basis of protected advocacy and views. The evidentiary standards of section 13(e) focus on views, expressions, and policies. These views, policies and expressions need not be dangerous, much less creative of a clear and present danger. They may be objectively true and in the interests of the American people. The Act thus imposes a political censorship, creating the strangest and most virulent of all heresies, "non-deviation", including "non-deviation" from the truth.

The sanctions on members of the organization are invalid because they penalize innocent association. Section 5 of the Communist Control Act carries the vices of the Act still further by utilizing protected expression and association to identify persons who are to be victimized as "members" of petitioner.

If the Act is sustained, there remain no effective limitations on Congress' control over political expression and association.

TWO

The Board and the court below applied the Act erroneously and in violation of the Constitution.

I. A. A detailed examination of the Board's application of each of the standards of 13(e) shows that the Board violated the Act by employing irrational interpretations of 13(e) and by relying on irrelevant matters.

B. The court below sustained the ultimate finding of the Board on the basis of six factors, which sum up to the facts that petitioner believes in the principles of Communism, advocates the ultimate objective of a classless, stateless world, calls itself the Communist Party of the United States, and has adopted views on certain questions of foreign policy which are similar to views of the Soviet Union. None of these facts has any tendency to prove the criteria of section 13(e) or the ultimate issue under section 3(3).

II. The Board's order and the decision below violate the Act because they rest on alleged conduct of petitioner which, if it ever took place, had been discontinued prior to enactment of the Act.

The issue under the Act was whether petitioner was a Communist-action organization at the time of the administrative proceeding, or, in any event, after September 23, 1950, the enactment date of the Act. Evidence of conduct prior to that date was relevant only so far as it explained the significance and purpose of post-Act activity.

The Board's Report indiscriminately commingles discussion of a few alleged contemporary practices with discussion of alleged episodes of the remote past, mostly relating to the period before 1940 when petitioner was affiliated with the Communist International.

The Report cites no evidence of post-Act conduct which can conceivably support a registration order. As to two of the eight standards of section 13(e) ("financial aid" and "training"), the Report concedes that there is no post-Act evidence. As to a third ("reporting"), none of the evidence relied on by the Board relates to the post-Act period. The Report itself shows that these three practices, if ever engaged in, were discontinued long before enactment of the Act. As to the remaining five standards, the post-Act evidence relied on by the Board consists of a handful of absurdly irrelevant incidents and writings.

The six factors which the court below regarded as determinative likewise do not involve relevant post-Act conduct. The only current matters to which they refer are petitioner's adherence to the ultimate objective of a classless, stateless world and its advocacy of various international policies similar to those supported by the Soviet Union.

The Board and the court below invoked a presumption of continuance to compensate for the absence of current evidence. Continuance cannot be presumed in the face of petitioner's uncontradicted testimony and of such changed circumstances as petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International and the latter organization's dissolution. Nor can it be presumed that conduct which was permissible when it occurred continued after enactment of legislation imposing sanctions for such conduct.

III. The Board rested, and the court below affirmed, the registration order primarily on the basis of petitioner's advocacy respecting current issues and its adherence to the principles of Marxism-Leninism. In so doing the Board and the court magnified the vice inherent in the Act that it violates the First Amendment by imposing sanctions for peaceable advocacy and association.

There is no suggestion that petitioner advocates anything but peaceable means to win acceptance of its immediate objectives. Moreover, petitioner's views and advocacy concerning current international and domestic issues present no danger of any evil against which the government may act. Accordingly, the reliance by the Board and the court below on petitioner's peaceable advocacy on current issues requires reversal.

Reversal is also required by the reliance of the Board and the court below on petitioner's adherence to the principles of Marxism-Leninism. The Board's assertion that Marxism-Leninism advocates the violent overthrow of the government is contrary to the evidence and to Schneiderman v. United States, and was not accepted by the court below. Moreover, the registration order does not merely abridge the right to advocate violent overthrow but suppresses all of petitioner's advocacy. Even advocacy of violent overthrow can be abridged only upon a finding of clear and present danger, and no such finding was made. The thrust of the Report and the opinion below is that petitioner should be ordered to register merely because it believes in the principles of Communism. The First Amendment, however, prohibits imposition of sanctions for belief.

IV. Of the Board's eight key findings on the standards of 13(e), the court below invalidated two—those on "reporting" and "secret practices"—as not supported by the evidence. In addition, the court below held that the "nondeviation" criterion of section 13(e)(2) has no relevance to the "objectives" component of the section 3(3) definition. Yet the Board used its finding on "non-deviation" to support its conclusion on the objectives component, as well as on the foreign control component.

The Board's ultimate conclusion was based on the totality of its eight findings under section 13(e). Two having been invalidated, and a third having been held to have been erroneously applied, it is apparent that the premises on which the Board acted do not support its ultimate conclusion and order. Moreover, of the five findings which survived, two had little if any weight against petitioner.

The affirmance below thus violates section 14 of the Act, which permits affirmance of a registration order only if the findings of the Board are supported by a preponderance of the evidence. It also contravenes the established principle that an administrative order cannot be sustained except upon the grounds on which it was predicated. It was the duty of the court below to remand the case for administrative redetermination in the light of the court's action regarding three key findings.

THREE

I. Petitioner was denied a fair hearing because of extra-legal pressures applied to members of the Board and the personal bias and prejudice of the Board members. Two Board members should have disqualified themselves on the basis of affidavits of bias and prejudice.

A. The members of the Board were given so-called recess appointments by the President on October 23, 1950. These appointments were held in abeyance by the Senate Judiciary Committee until July 30, 1951. Accordingly, for many months during the pendency of the administrative proceeding the tenure of the Board members was subject to the pleasure of a committee which had reported to Congress that petitioner is a Communist-action organization. During this period, witnesses for the Attorney General reported on the conduct of the proceeding by the Board members to an employee of the Judiciary Committee. Board member LaFollette recognized the existence of the pressures generated in this fashion. These pressures prevented petitioner from receiving a fair hearing.

B. During the course of the hearing, Board member McHale, a member of the panel taking the evidence, made a speech before the Women's National Democratic Club in which she discussed the proceeding and expressed prejudgment on issues in the case.

After issuance of the panel's recommended decision, and while the proceeding was pending before the full Board, Board chairman Brown and the Board's general counsel, appeared on a radio and television forum, commented on the evidence, expressed satisfaction with the recommended decision, and stated their conviction that petitioner is a Communist-action organization.

McHale and Brown thus acted with gross impropriety and exhibited bias and prejudice against petitioner. The Board erred in refusing to disqualify them on the basis of affidavits of bias and prejudice filed by petitioner.

II. The original appointments to the Board were made in violation of the Constitution, and the acts of the Board members prior to Senate confirmation of their appointments were invalid.

A. The original appointments were made as recess appointments, to the offices which were newly created by enactment of the Act. "Vacancies" do not "happen" under Article 2, sec. 2, cl. 2 of the Constitution in offices newly created by law. And even if "vacancies happened" in the Board upon passage of the Act, they did not happen "during the Recess of the Senate."

B. Furthermore, the appointments were made during an adjournment of the Senate to a day certain. The adjournment was not "the Recess" as used in Section 2, which refers to the sine die recess between sessions. Hence the original appointments were also invalid because when made there were no vacancies during "the Recess."

C. If the adjournment was "the Recess," then it follows that the reconvening of Congress on November 27, 1950 was the beginning of the "next session." In that case, the appointments expired when the "next session" ended with the sine die adjournment of Congress on January 2, 1951. Hence the appointees to the Board did not hold office from January 2, 1951 until August 9, 1951, when their appointments were confirmed by the Senate.

D. The invalidity of the appointments requires setting aside of the Board's order. The attack on the validity of the appointments is direct, and the point was seasonably raised.

FOUR

I. It appears from the face of the Report and the decision below that the findings of the Board are not supported by a preponderance of the evidence, as required by section 14(a). The Report and the opinion below show: (1) There was no relevant post-Act evidence adverse to petitioner. (2) Two of the Board's key findings were set aside by the court as not supported by the evidence; a third was improperly applied under the court's holding; and petitioner was entitled to favorable findings under three of the 13(e) criteria. (3) There was no relevant evidence to support findings adverse to petitioner under any of the 13(e) criteria as properly construed. (4) The evidence relied on by the Board and the court below does not support the finding that there is a world Communist movement as defined by section 2. (5) The six "basic facts" on which the court below affirmed are irrelevant to both the section 3(3) definition and the 13(e) criteria. (6) The Board's ultimate conclusion rested solely on its findings under 13(e), which, as the court below held, have no relevance to the objectives component of the 3(3) definition. Accordingly, the ultimate finding as to that component is not supported either by the evidence or by subsidiary findings.

II. The Board's finding as to the existence and nature of "the world Communist movement," if authorized by the Act, is not supported by the evidence. Section 2 defines that movement in terms of organizational form, source of control, objectives, and means. There is no evidence to establish any one of these elements as described in section 2, and the Report cites none.

The court below found that there is a world Communist movement in the sense that there are Communist parties in various countries which base their program and activities on a common economic and political outlook and work toward the ultimate achievement of a common social goal—a universal, classless, stateless society. This is not the movement described by section 2.

III. The findings of the Board are based on incompetent and discredited testimony and on misrepresentation of the evidence. The record discloses that the Attorney General's witnesses were unworthy of credence and that their testimony in this proceeding was shot through with fabrications. The Board relied on testimony proven to be false and in some cases repudiated or withdrawn by the witness himself. It ignored all testimony of the Attorney General's witnesses which was favorable to petitioner.

The Board's reliance on incompetent and discredited testimony and its misrepresentation of testimony appears from a comparison of the record with the Report's findings on five subjects which are given major significance in the Report: petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International; the reconstitution of the Communist Party; force and violence; financial aid; and representatives of the Communist International.

The Board applied a double standard, rejecting the testimony of petitioner's witnesses even when corroborated and uncontradicted, while eagerly accepting and exaggerating the false testimony of the Attorney General's unreliable witnesses.

IV. The court below erred in denying petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence. This motion, filed pursuant to section 14, showed that after conclusion of the administrative hearing two of the Attorney General's principal witnesses committed perjury in other proceedings, and a third admitted a course of perjury. The Board had in numerous instances rested material findings adverse to petitioner on the testimony of these three witnesses.

Under section 14, the hearing must be reopened if proffered new evidence is material. This standard was met by petitioner's motion.

ARGUMENT

PART ONE

THE ACT IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL ON ITS FACE

I. The True Nature of the Act

The Act polices freedom of association and suppresses political non-conformity. In order to conceal its true nature it masquerades under false colors.

The Act poses as a registration or disclosure measure. In fact no organization could survive its kind of "registration," nor does the Act contemplate that any organization will register under it. Instead, the Act is designed to outlaw the Communist Party, and to punish its officers and members solely for their association. The outlawry of petitioner also supplies a foundation for a similar proscription of other organizations, including trade unions, as "Communist-front" or "Communist-infiltrated" organizations.

The Act purports to accord the petitioner a hearing. In fact the hearing is a sham. The Act predetermines petitioner's guilt, establishes spurious standards of proof, and creates a biased tribunal to announce the built-in verdict.

A. The Act Is an Outlawry Statute

The Act provides for administrative proceedings before the Board, upon petitions of the Attorney General, to determine whether or not accused organizations shall be required to register as Communist-action or Communist-front organizations (sec. 13). The Communist Control Act of 1954 added provisions authorizing the Board, on petition of the Attorney General, to declare trade unions to be "Communist-infiltrated" (3(4A) and 13A of the Act, added by sec. 7 of the Communist Control Act). Such organizations are not required to register, but are deprived of the benefits of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The three types of organizations are collectively referred to as "Communist organizations" (sec. 3(5)).

Provision is made for judicial review of the Board's orders by the Court of Appeals and on certiorari by this Court. On review, the Board's findings are conclusive only if supported by the preponderance of the evidence. (Sec. 14.)

A Communist-action organization is defined as one "which (i) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, and (ii) operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement as referred to in section 2 of this title" (sec. 3(3)).

Thus the definition of a Communist-action organization is tied into findings made in section 2 of the Act, which supply the only definition of "the world Communist movement." Section 2 finds, among other things, that this movement is controlled by the Communist dictatorship of a foreign country and operates through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization. It finds that the movement seeks to overthrow capitalist governments by treacherous and terroristic methods and to establish in their place totalitarian dictatorships subservient to the foreign dictatorship.

A Communist-front organization is defined as an organization which is substantially dominated or controlled by a Communist-action organization and is primarily operated for the purpose of giving aid or support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement (sec. 3(4)).

A Communist-infiltrated organization is defined as one which (a) is substantially dominated or controlled by an individual or individuals who are, or within three years have been, engaged in giving support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement, and (b) is serving, or within three years has served, as a means for giving aid or support to any such organization, government, or movement, or for the impairment of the military or industrial strength of the United States (sec. 3(4A)).

A Communist-action organization is required to register as such with the Attorney General. The registration statement must show the names and addresses of the organization's officers and members during the preceding year, give a detailed accounting of all moneys received and expended, including the source of its revenues and the purposes of its exenditures, and list all printing and duplicating facilities. Annual reports must be filed to keep the registration up to date. The registration statement is open for public inspection. (Sec. 7.)

When a registration order against a Communist-action organization becomes final, as it does on exhaustion of judicial review (sec. 14(b)), its officers have an individual duty to register the organization and to list its members (sec. 7(h)). Members not so listed are under a duty to register themselves after an administrative determination of their membership (secs. 8, 13(a)). Failure to comply with these duties is punishable by imprisonment up to five years, fine up to $10,000, or both. These penalties are potentially astronomical, since each day of failure to register constitutes a separate offense. Any falsity in a registration statement is punishable by a similar penalty. Here too astronomical accumulation is made possible because each misstatement and each omission is a separate offense. (Sec. 15.)

The listing or self-listing of members of petitioner in compliance with a registration order has been made an impossible task by section 5 of the Communist Control Act. That section enumerates thirteen criteria for determining "membership" in the Communist Party. These are dependent on facts of which the petitioner and its officers can have no knowledge, and are so vague that no one can determine who are "members." (See infra, pp. 75-82.)

The entry of a final registration order against a Communist-action organization automatically subjects the organization and its members to crippling sanctions. These sanctions apply whether or not the organization registers.

The sanctions are the following:

(1) The organization must label publications and literature which if distributes by mail or in interstate or foreign commerce as being disseminated by a Communist organization, which is by definition a participant in the foreign-controlled seditious conspiracy described in section 2. Its radio and television broadcasts must be announced as sponsored by a Communist organization. These requirements apply without regard to the nature and content of the publications and broadcasts. (Sec. 10.)

(2) It is unlawful for members of the organization to hold non-elective federal employment, employment in any privately owned "defense facility," or office or employment in labor unions; nor may they represent employers in matters arising under the National Labor Relations Act (sec. 5, as amended by sec. 6 of the Communist Control Act). A defense facility is any establishment listed by the Secretary of Defense on his ex parte determination that the security of the United States requires such listing (secs. 3(7), 5(b)).

Accordingly, what employment is open to members of the organization, and, for that matter, whether any employment at all is open to them, rests in the unreviewable fiat discretion of the Secretary of Defense.

(3) Government employees and employees of defense facilities are prohibited from contributing funds or services to the organization, and even from subscribing to any of its publications (secs. 5(a)(2) and 3(6)). Accordingly, the ex parte determination of the Secretary of Defense limits, or may virtually eliminate, the sources from which the organization can obtain funds or services or find readers of its publications.

(4) It is unlawful for members of the organization to apply for or use passports (sec. 6).

(5) Aliens who are or ever have been members of the organization are excluded from admission into the United States, and if already in the country must be deported. An alien may not be naturalized if he was a member of the organization within ten years preceding the filing of his naturalization petition. Naturalized citizens who join or affiliate with the organization within five years after naturalization are subject to revocation of citizenship.[4]

(6) Contributions to the organization are not tax deductible, and the organization itself is denied tax exemptions (sec. 11).

The prohibitions described in the first four paragraphs above are enforceable by criminal penalties of up to five years imprisonment and $10,000 fine (sec. 15).

[4] Originally contained in secs. 22 and 25 of the Act, these sanctions have been carried forward by secs. 212(a)(28)(E), 241(a)(6)(E), 313(a)(2)(G) and 340(c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 66 Stat. 163, 8 U.S.C. 1182, 1251, 1424, 1451.

The sanctions on members apply regardless of their personal innocence or lack of knowledge of the organization's alleged illegal or conspiratorial actions or purposes, and though their activities are confined to constitutionally protected areas.[4a]

The registration order has still other consequences, as follows:

(1) Any person who signs or whose name is listed on a registration statement as an officer or member of, or a contributor to, the organization is in jeopardy of prosecution under the extravagantly vague provisions of section 4(a) of the Act, as well as under the Smith Act and a host of other criminal laws.[5] A registration order, therefore, commands the officers of the organization to incriminate themselves and to become informers on the members. If the officers fail to register the organization, the members are faced with an impossible alternative. If they register, they expose themselves to onerous civil penalties and invite prosecution under the Smith Act and other statutes. If they do not register, they are subject to prosecution for their failure.

(2) The registration order officially brands the organization, its members and contributors, as participants in the seditious conspiracy defined in section 2, and subjects them to public opprobrium and ensuing social and economic reprisals.

[4a] The sanctions against Communist-front organizations and their members differ from the foregoing only in a few ameliorating details.

[5] Section 4(a) of the Act makes it criminal to conspire "to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship" under foreign control. And see infra, p. 34, ftn. 8, for a list of other federal criminal statutes which might be invoked against members of a registered organization.

(3) The registration order makes it dangerous for other organizations or persons to associate with the proscribed organization or its members or to support by constitutionally protected means social, economic or political ideas advocated by it. For under the Act's evidentiary criteria of front and infiltrated organizations, an organization which has any dealings with or expresses views similar to those of a Communist-action organization or its members, is itself in danger of being condemned as a front or infiltrated organization (secs. 13(f), 13A(e)). Moreover, under the sweeping criteria of section 5 of the Communist Control Act, any person who has any contact or dealings with the Communist Party or its members may thereby be determined to be a member of the Party, become liable to register as such, incur the other penalties for membership, and jeopardize the status of any organization to which he belongs. (See infra, pp. 75-82.) A registration order, therefore, quarantines the organization, depriving it of access to the people and the people of access to the ideas it propagates.

The total impact of the Act is such, therefore, that if the organization registers, it destroys itself and jeopardizes the livelihood and liberty of its members.[6]. If a member registers, he destroys himself. On the other hand, if there is no registration, the organization, its officers and members are subject to severe criminal penalties which cumulate for each day of non-registration. A registration order, therefore, affords an illusory choice between suicide by registration or governmental execution for non-registration.

The character of the Act as an outlawry statute is underscored by the daily cumulative penalties of section 15 for failure to register. This failure is not an ordinary crime which cumulative criminal penalties might deter. It is a course of elementary self-preservation to avoid ruinous consequences. Since self-preservation must have primacy, the threat of cumulative penalties cannot induce self-destruction by registration. The role of the cumulative penalties, therefore, is to exact life-sentences as the price of attempted self-preservation.

[6] Furthermore, the organization and its officers incur astronomical criminal penalties for the inevitable "false statements" and "omissions" in the list of members, which are induced by section 5 of the Communist Control Act. See infra, pp. 75-82.

The Court has recognized that the effect of an adverse listing by the Attorney General, unaccompanied by the sanctions of the Act, is virtually to destroy the listed organization. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123, 139, 142, 161, 175.

The assertion that the Act is a disclosure statute is outright hypocrisy. No legitimate disclosure legislation imposes destructive penalties on those who comply with it by registering. Nor does it make the act of registration a self-exposure to onerous criminal and civil liabilities created by the legislation itself.

The registration order, therefore, does not, and was not intended to, result in registration. Its function is to lay a foundation for mass punishment of members of the petitioner and other condemned organizations. Far from accomplishing disclosure, it compels concealment, the only sanctuary left to the organization and its members.[7] [7] The Attorney General has acknowledged that the registration order in this case, if sustained, will result in the outlawry or destruction of petitioner. Hearings before Subc. No. 1 of Comm. on Judiciary, H.R. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess., April 12, 1954, p. 137; and public statement of Attorney General Brownell quoted in 100 Cong. Rec. 14401 (daily pagination). Attorney General Clark, testifying on the Mundt bill, the ancestor of the Act and a far less stringent measure, described the bill as one of "several proposed bills which seek to outlaw communism and the Communist Party." Hearings on Proposed Legislation to Curb or Control the Communist Party of the United States, Subc. on Legislation of Comm. on Un-American Activities, H.R. 80th Cong., 2d Sess., on H.R. 4422 and 4581, p. 17 (hereafter cited as House Hearings).

B. The Act Predetermines Petitioner's Guilt

1. The Legislative History.

The Act purports to require the registration of Communist-action organizations and their members as participants in a foreign-controlled conspiracy to commit espionage, sabotage, treason, violent revolution, etc., on behalf of a foreign power. The activities claimed to supply justification for the registration requirement are already punishable under numerous federal criminal statutes,[8] or if not, could easily be made so. The Act thus establishes a mechanism to prosecute accused persons not for their alleged crimes, but for their failure to register themselves as criminals. The only rational explanation for this shift of the locus of punishment from the crime itself to failure to register as a criminal is that the Act seeks to punish Communists as criminal conspirators even though they are not and cannot be proved to be such. The legislative history and the scheme of the Act show that such is its purpose and effect.[9] [8] E.g., the following sections of 18 U.S. Code: 2153-2156 (sabotage); 793-798 (espionage); 2383 (inciting rebellion or insurrection); 2384 (seditious conspiracy); 2385 (advocating forceful overthrow of government); 2381 (treason); 2382 (misprision of treason); 951 (failure to register as foreign agent); 957 (possession of property of a foreign government for use in violating U.S. statute); 2387-2388 (undermining loyalty, discipline or morale of the armed forces); 2386 (failure to register by organizations engaged in civilian military activity, subject to foreign control, affiliated with foreign government, or seeking to overthrow government by force); 1361-1364 (damaging federal property or communications); 1381 (enticing desertion and harboring deserters); 2390 (enlistment to serve against United States).

[9] The bill enacted was the Senate rewrite, sponsored by Senator McCarran, of H.R. 9490, 81st Cong., 2d Sess. (Wood bill). The antecedent bills were: H.R. 4422, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (Mundt bill); H.R. 5852, 80th Cong., 2d Sess. (Mundt-Nixon bill); H.R. 3342, 81st Cong., 1st Sess. (Nixon bill); S. 1194 and S. 1196, reported out as S. 2311, 81st Cong., 1st Sess. (Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston bill); S. 4037, 81st Cong., 2d Sess. (McCarran bill); H.R.

The legislative history of the Act discloses the following:

(1) The sponsors of the legislation were bent on outlawing the Communist Party by requiring it to register as a foreign agent. The first ancestor of the Act, the Mundt bill (H.R. 4422, 80th Cong., 1st Sess.), would have required the Communist Party by name to register as a foreign agent without judicial or quasi-judicial determination of the facts.[10] However, the Congress was informed by Attorney General Clark and various constitutional authorities, testifying before the legislative sub-committee of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, that this singling out of the Communist Party by name was probably unconstitutional as fiat legislation violating the due process and bill of attainder clauses. (House Hearings, pp. 19-20, 113, 115, 117, 209-11, 256, 432, 493-95.)

Because of these warnings, the Committee on Un-American Activities rejected the crude approach of the Mundt

Rep. 1358, 81st Cong., 1st Sess. (on S. 2311); H. Rep. 2980, 81st Cong., 2d Sess. (on H.R. 9490); Sen. Rep. 2369, 81st Cong., 2d Sess. (on S. 4037). Applicable hearings are: Before Subcommittee on Legislation of Committee on Un-American Activities, H.R., 80th Cong., 2d Sess., on H.R. 4422 and H.R. 4581 (Feb., 1948); Before Committee on Judiciary, Sen., 80th Cong., 2d Sess., on H.R. 5852 (May 1948); Before Committee on Judiciary, Sen., 81st Cong., 1st Sess., on S. 1196 (April-June, 1949); Before Committee on Un-American Activities, H.R., 81st Cong., 2d Sess., on H.R. 3903 and H.R. 7595 (March, 1950).

[10] Section 1 of the Mundt bill provided: "That notwithstanding the provisions of any other law any person who is a member of the Communist Party or of any organization, association, or other combination of individuals which is dominated, directed or controlled by the Communist Party, shall be required to register with the Department of Justice, Washington, District of Columbia, as an agent of a foreign principal." Mr. Mundt later proposed that his bill be amended, for purposes of administrative convenience, to require registration by the Party itself, rather than by the individual members. House Hearings, p. 4. The bill is quoted in these hearings at p. 2.

bill and reported the Mundt-Nixon bill (H.R. 5852, 80th Cong., 2d Sess.), which first proposed the scheme of an administrative proceeding to determine registerable organizations. Representative Nixon, chairman of the legislative sub-committee of the Un-American Activities Committee and co-author of the bill, explained to the Senate Judiciary Committee the reason for the change (emphasis added):

> "We felt also that the Mundt bill, in its original form, was not the proper approach to the problem for two reasons. In the first place, the bill specifically named the Communist Party of the United States and attempted to build its definitions around the name of the party. From having heard the witnesses before our committee, we came to the conclusion that naming the Communist Party by name and attempting to build the entire registration provisions around such a definition was an unconstitutional approach and consequently the committee attempted to find a legislative device for meeting the problem in a constitutional manner. . . .
> "Our committee realizes that it would be a very dangerous thing to bring to the Congress and to the Senate a measure which went too far and which ran a great risk of being held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court because we realize that the Communists would make great capital of such a holding. For that reason alone our committee was particularly careful to attempt to find a constitutional answer to this problem. That is the reason that we do not name the Communist Party." [11]

The House and Senate Committees also informed the Congress in their reports on the bill which became the Act:

> "To make membership in a specifically designated existing organization illegal per se would run the risk of being held unconstitutional on the ground that such an action was legislative fiat." (H. Rep. No. 2980, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., on H.R. 9490, p. 5; Sen. Rep. No. 1358, 81st Cong., 1st Sess., on S. 2311, p. 9.)

[11] Hearings before Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 80th Cong., 2d Sess., on H.R. 5852, pp. 40, 45-46 (hereafter cited as Senate Hearings).

Accordingly, constitutional doubts alone prevented the authors of the Act from identifying the Communist Party by name, and led them, in Mr. Nixon's words, to attempt "to find a legislative device for meeting the problem in a constitutional manner."

The legislative history of the Act reveals the nature of "the problem" with which the authors of the Act were confronted. It shows that Congress knew that the Communist Party could not fairly be proved to be engaged in a seditious conspiracy or controlled by a foreign power. The "problem," therefore, was how to order it to register as such an organization without proof of guilt and without specifically naming it. The Act is the "legislative device" to solve this "problem."

The problem was first disclosed to the Congress by Attorney General Clark. In the same testimony in which he cast doubt on the validity of legislation which would specifically name the petitioner, the Attorney General advised that there already existed laws which required registration of foreign agents and punished advocacy of violence, but that they could not be employed against the Communist Party or its membership because the government could not prove a case under them. Justifying the failure to use such existing legislation against the Communist Party or its members, Mr. Clark explained:

(a) As to the failure to use the Smith Act, which prohibits advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force and membership in a group which so advocates:

> "By means of this statute, we are able to prosecute, provided we are able to obtain proof of force or violence. . . . Adequate proof against the individual in this regard is most difficult to adduce. In fact, the dignitaries of the American Communist Party have each denied that they have any aim or purpose to overthrow the Government by force or violence. Because of the shifting program and the character of the Party line, which can adjust itself to suit almost any limitation, we have found it more practical, effective, and much more speedy to proceed under other Federal statutes." (House Hearings, p. 21).

(b) As to the failure to prosecute the Communist Party for not registering under the Voorhis Act, which requires registration of organizations subject to foreign control or having the purpose of overthrowing the United States government by force;

"In order to force a registration or to prosecute any organization for failing to register under the act, we must prove in one or more of the combinations described in the act that the purpose or aim or one of the purposes or aims of the organization is to overthrow by force or violence the Government of the United States, or that the organization is engaged in civilian military activity prohibited by the statute or is subject to foreign control.

"The fact is that the description of activities which make it obligatory for an organization to register is enough to brand the organization as subversive. As soon as the Voorhis Act was passed, . . . the Communist Party changed its constitution for the purpose of disaffiliating, as the announcement put it at the time, from the Communist International in order to avoid registering under what the party called the Voorhis Blacklist act. . . .

"You have asked me what, in my opinion, is the true character and aim of the Communist Party in the United States, Mr. Chairman. The ultimate question, however, is not what my opinion may be, but what proof exists to successfully prosecute an individual or organization under the above statutes. Although the Voorhis Act has been on the books since 1940, no Attorney General has directed a prosecution under it." (Ibid.)

(c) As to failure to prosecute the Communist Party or its members for not registering under the Foreign Agents Registration Act, as amended:

"By the provisions of this act, agents of foreign principals are required to file a registration statement with the Attorney General and to label political propaganda disseminated by them. The terms of the act are sufficiently broad to require registration by members of the Communist Party; provided, of course, that proof is available that they are operating in this country as agents of a foreign principal. This is a difficult task. . . ." (Id., pp. 21-22).

The sponsors of the legislation, accepting the Attorney General's testimony, informed Congress that the Act was necessary because the Communist Party could not be proved, by accepted legal standards, to be a seditious foreign agent. The Senate Committee stated that the Act was required by the "inadequacy" of existing legislation. It explained:

> "Congress has passed several laws which were directed specifically at curbing the subversive activities of communism in the United States, but they have proved largely ineffectual in accomplishing their purpose. As has been cited above, the Attorney General on February 5, 1948, testified before a committee of Congress that present laws were inadequate to deal with the subversive activities of the Communist threat in the United States.[12] There have been no significant additions to statutory law in this field since that date." (Sen. Rep. No. 1358, supra, p. 7).[13]

The House Committee Reports contain passages to the same effect as to the "inadequacy of existing legislation" (H. Rep. No. 2980, supra, p. 2; H. Rep. No. 1844, supra, p. 5), and Mr. Nixon made a similar explanation when testifying before the Senate Committee (Senate Hearings, supra, pp. 41-43).

In summary, therefore, the legislative history discloses the following:

[12] The reference is to the testimony of Mr. Clark which we have just reviewed.

[13] The Report goes on to explain the "inadequacy" of each of the "present laws" along the lines of Attorney General Clark's testimony.

(1) The sponsors of the legislation were bent on outlawing the Communist Party (and subsequently other organizations) by requiring it to register as a seditious foreign agent.

(2) There already existed legislation requiring foreign agents and seditious organizations to register, as well as punishing seditious activity and advocacy. But this legislation could not serve the purpose because it required proof of violation, and such proof was not available against the Communist Party.

(3) On the other hand, the Communist Party could not be legislatively required by name to register as a seditious foreign agent, for all authorities agreed that this would be unconstitutional.

The Act represents the sponsors' attempt to resolve this dilemma. In order to avoid its first horn—the invalidity of a legislative verdict of guilt against petitioner by name—the Act provides that the name of the guilty party shall be determined administratively. In order to avoid the second horn of the dilemma—the absence of proof of guilt—the Act rigs the administrative procedure to insure that the petitioner will be ordered to register regardless of the evidence. This it accomplishes by three devices: (1) The Act predetermines the case by itself making the findings of fact prerequisite to entry of a registration order against petitioner. (2) The Act sets up standards of proof for the administrative adjudication which are so vague and irrelevant to the ultimate issue as to permit the administrative agency to execute the legislative verdict by making a determination of guilt without proof of guilt. (3) The Act creates as the adjudicative body a Board which is necessarily biased and prejudiced against the petitioner and which has an interest in deciding against it.

2. The Device of Legislative Predetermination of the Facts Essential to Guilt.

(1) Under the Act, certain facts essential to guilt have been found legislatively and as a matter of law are removed from administrative adjudication by the Board. These are the "facts" as to the existence and nature of the world Communist movement.

Section 3(3) defines Communist-action organization as an organization which is substantially controlled by the foreign power or organization "controlling the world Communist movement referred to in section 2" and which operates primarily to advance the objectives of the "world Communist movement as referred to in section 2." Accordingly, there can be a Communist-action organization in the United States only if there is a world Communist movement of the character described in section 2. However, the existence and nature of the world Communist movement are not issues left to adjudication by the Board. Instead, these "facts" are found by Congress in section 2.[14] The findings are then incorporated into section 3(3) in the form of assumptions of fact which the Board is not authorized to re-examine, but is required to accept as the foundation for its decision.

The correctness of these legislative findings regarding the world Communist movement is also assumed by the [14] Section 2 represents the world Communist movement as "A world-wide revolutionary movement," controlled by the "Communist dictatorship" of a foreign country. It asserts that the purpose of this movement "is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization." Section 2 further finds that the foreign Communist dictatorship establishes and utilizes Communist-action organizations in various countries which "promote the objectives of such movement by conspiratorial and coercive tactics" and "by bringing about the overthrow of existing governments by any available means, including force, if necessary."

eight criteria which section 13(e) requires the Board to apply in deciding whether an accused organization is a Communist action organization. Seven of the eight criteria require the Board to act on the assumption that a world Communist movement exists and has the characteristics found in section 2.[15]

Accordingly, under the Act the Board is not free to decide that there is no world Communist movement, or that if there is one it is not controlled by a foreign government or does not have the sinister objectives and methods attributed to it by section 2. The Act does not contemplate Board determination of these issues. Moreover, the Board could not decide them in the negative without overruling the Congressional findings which are part of the definition and violating the standards which the Act requires it to apply.

The court below and the Board agreed with us that the section 2 findings on the existence and nature of the world Communist movement are binding upon the Board and the courts, and that these matters were not subjects for adjudication (R. 2132-33; Resp. Br. below, pp. 61-63).

(2) In addition, section 2 legislatively makes findings on the existence and identity of a domestic Communist-action organization. Since these are on the same issues which are ostensibly to be determined by the Board, the Act thereby predetermines the Board's decision.

In the first place, section 2 finds that there is an organization in the United States which is a Communist-action organization. Sections 2(5) and 2(6) find that the foreign Communist dictatorship establishes and utilizes Communist-action organizations in various countries. Section 2(12) finds that there is a foreign-controlled "Communist network in the United States." Section 2(15) finds that "the Communist movement in the United States" is an organization, and that "the Communist organization in the United States" (emphasis added) endangers the security of the United States.

In addition, section 2 finds that "the Communist organization in the United States" has the major characteristics which, when supposedly found to exist by the Board, determine the Board's decision. Section 2(6) predetermines the Board's finding under section 13(e)(1) that the Communist organization in the United States operates under the direction of the foreign Communist power and to effectuate its policies. Section 2(5) predetermines the Board's finding under 13(e)(6) that members of the domestic Communist organization are under foreign discipline. Section 2(7) predetermines the Board's finding under 13(e)(7) that the domestic Communist organization utilizes secret practices to promote its objectives and conceal its true character. And section 2(9) predetermines the Board's finding under 13(e)(8) that members of the domestic organization have transferred their allegiance from the United States to the foreign power.

By legislative fiat, section 2 thus predetermines virtually all of the elements requisite for the entry of a registration order, including the supposed existence, nature, objectives and foreign control of a world Communist movement, and the existence, purposes and characteristics of an organization which it finds to be the domestic agent of that movement. Unlike the predetermination with regard to a world Communist movement, the findings as to the claimed domestic agent of the movement are not expressly incorporated into the definition and the evidentiary standards, so that the latter issues are ostensibly open for administrative determination. But this difference is not significant. For it would be fatuous to expect the Board to overrule legislative findings on the identical issues it is supposed to determine. This is particularly true because these findings furnish the justification for the enactment of the legislation and the establishment of the Board. Moreover, they are prefaced by Congress' assertion that they were made "As a result of evidence adduced before various committees of the Senate and House of Representatives."

(3) Congress, then, found that there is a Communist organization in the United States, that it is the agent and operates to carry out the seditious objectives of a destructive world Communist movement, which is controlled by a foreign power. Obviously, therefore, Congress left only one thing for the Board to find. The Board's sole function was to supply the name of the particular organization which Congress had in mind when it referred in section 2(15) to "the Communist organization in the United States."

As to this there can be no earthly doubt. Petitioner denies the truth of the findings of section 2. But it is beyond question that by these findings Congress referred to, and meant, the Communist Party of the United States, the petitioner here. Indeed, as we have seen, only qualms as to constitutionality kept Congress from identifying the petitioner by name. The evidence adduced before various committees of Congress, on which the findings purport to rest, dealt with the petitioner by name; the legislation was recommended as a weapon against the petitioner by name; and the reports and debates dealt with the petitioner by name. Moreover, section 2(15) of the Act refers to a single "Communist organization in the United States," and if the petitioner is not the organization meant by Congress, it is obvious that there is none which can possibly be identified as such.

If after all this there could remain any lingering doubt that Congress intended to and did identify the petitioner as the Communist-action organization in the United States, two further circumstances would dispel it. Section 2(15), in describing "the Communist organization in the United States," contains verbatim excerpts from Judge Hand's description of the petitioner in United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201, 212, 213. And the House and Senate reports accompanying the legislation advised Congress, in identical language, that the petitioner is a Communist-action organization within the meaning of the section 3(3) definition. The reports stated:

> "There is incontrovertible evidence of the fact that the Communist Party of the United States is dominated by such totalitarian dictatorship and that it is one of the principal instrumentalities used by the world Communist movement in its ruthless and timeless endeavor to advance the world march of Communism." [16]

This Court flatly ruled in Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 535, 544, that section 2(15) of the Act in mentioning "the Communist movement in the United States" refers to the petitioner herein.

Accordingly, even the particularized identification of the petitioner as the organization against which the first registration order should be issued was likewise legislatively predetermined. The Board could not have found that petitioner was not the domestic Communist organization referred to in section 2 without overruling Congress.

Nothing is clearer than that the Act is fiat legislation as much as Representative Mundt's original proposal which would have required the Communist Party by name to register as a foreign agent.[17]

[16] House Rep. No. 2980, supra, pp. 1-2; Sen. Rep. No. 1358, supra, p. 5. The same passage appears in the House Committee Report on the Mundt-Nixon bill. House Rep. No. 1844, supra, p. 3.

[17] While this case was pending in the court below, Congress adopted the naked fiat of the Mundt bill by enacting section 4 of the Communist Control Act, which declares the petitioner by name to be a Communist-action organization.

3. The Device of Irrational and Vague Standards.

Section 13(e) is the second device employed by the Act to guarantee that a registration order would be issued against petitioner without the necessity for proof that it is a Communist-action organization. That section directs the Board to take eight criteria into consideration in making its determination. These, singly and collectively, have no reasonable relation to the ultimate facts to be established. Instead, they furnish irrelevant and vague standards which permit the Board to give a spurious rationalization to the legislative finding against petitioner.

(a) By the section 3(3) definition, a Communist-action organization is distinguished by two characteristics: (1) foreign control, and (2) advancement of the objectives attributed by section 2 to the world Communist movement, all of which are seditious. However, none of the criteria of section 13(e) (which were the only criteria applied by the Board) has any relevance whatsoever to the advancement of seditious objectives, and still less to those attributed by section 2 to the world Communist movement. Only three of the eight standards of 13(e) ("directives and policies," "non-deviation," and "secret practices") have anything to do with objectives, and none of these requires proof that the objectives referred to are those attributed to the world Communist movement or are seditious.

The court below (R. 2118, 2121, 2122), and the Board in its brief below (p. 72), agreed that the standards of section 13(e) have no relevance to the issue of whether an accused organization operates to advance the evil objectives described in section 2.[18]

Accordingly, section 13(e) admittedly authorized the Board to find that petitioner advances the seditions objectives described in section 2, without proof of that fact.

[18] The Board stated (Br. 72): "Whether the individual foreign controlled policies are good or evil is irrelevant."

(b) As to foreign control, which is the first component of the section 3(3) definition, the situation is hardly better. On that issue, the tests supplied by 13(e) are nebulous, circumstantial, and largely irrelevant. This becomes plain when each is examined.

"Directives and policies." Section 13(e)(1) directs the Board to consider "the extent to which" the accused organization formulates and carries out its policies or performs its activities "pursuant to directives or to effectuate the policies" of the foreign government which directs and controls the world Communist movement described in section 2.

At first blush this seems to be merely a more involved statement of the 3(3) definition. But, as we have already seen, it is acknowledged that neither this nor the other tests are relevant to the second component of the definition, and in fact this standard does not require proof of the seditious objectives described in section 2.[19] Furthermore, section 3(3) states the two elements of a Communist-action organization in the conjunctive. Section 13(e)(1), however, refers to the elements of foreign control and objectives in the disjunctive. Accordingly, it authorizes the Board to infer foreign control from the fact that the alleged agent advances objectives which are not peculiar to the alleged principal, but which may be shared by, and may benefit, non-Communist individuals and governments, including our own. This is plainly irrational. Yet it is just what the Board did under this section (see infra, pp. 133-37).

[19] Section 3(3) defines a Communist-action organization as one which operates to advance the seditious objectives ascribed to the world Communist movement and the Soviet Union by section 2. Section 13(e)(1), however, does not require the Board to consider whether the organization seeks to effectuate the alleged seditious Soviet objectives. Instead, it directs the Board to consider only whether the accused organization seeks to effectuate any policies of the Soviet Union, irrespective of their content.

"Non-deviation." Section 13(e)(2) directs the Board to consider "the extent to which" the accused organization's views and policies "do not deviate from those of" the Soviet Union. The section does not confine the inquiry to Soviet views and policies on particular matters. Accordingly, evidence of non-deviation with respect to any of the countless subjects on which the Soviet Union has expressed a view becomes proof of foreign domination and control and of a purpose to advance the seditious objectives ascribed to the world Communist movement by section 2.

This test is irrational in several respects.

(1) It permits the advancement of the seditious objectives described in section 2 to be established by proof of "non-deviation" from views and policies which are either unrelated to the national interest or are in fact calculated to promote the welfare of the United States and its people. The court below acknowledged that this standard has no relevancy to the objectives element of the section 3(3) definition, asserting that "the point" of the test is "foreign domination" (R. 2122).

(2) Identity of views cannot be a rational criterion of Soviet control if the views involved are not peculiarly characteristic of the Soviet Union, if they are widely held by non-Communists, if they are demonstrably true, or if they are independently arrived at. Yet the standard ignores these factors. Under this obscurantist test, the stigma of foreign control and sedition can be avoided only by adopting views which are demonstrably false if the Soviet Union has adopted views which are demonstrably true. In the area where views may reasonably differ, the stigma can be avoided only by mechanically opposing any position taken by the Soviet Union, regardless of its merits, thus subjecting oneself to Soviet control in reverse.[20] [20] As we later point out (infra, pp. 140-44), the Board applied all the irrational features of the non-deviation test, predicating guilt on views which concededly may be in the national interest, demonstrably true, widely held, and independently arrived at.

"Financial Aid." Section 13(e)(3) directs the Board to consider "the extent to which" an accused organization "receives financial or other aid, directly or indirectly, from or at the direction of the foreign government or organization that directs, dominates and controls the world Communist movement described in section 2."

It is obvious that a contribution to a cause which the contributor deems worthy of support does not thereby subject the recipient to the "direction, domination or control" of the contributor. Nor does it make the recipient the agent of the contributor "to advance the objectives" of the latter, let alone to advance specific seditious objectives. History and experience provide many examples of aid by governmental and non-governmental bodies to organizations which they do not "dominate or control" and which operate to promote their own objectives, not those of the donor. Similarly, it is well known that bad people contribute to good causes, and vice versa.

This is not, of course, to deny the obvious truth that the giving or withholding of financial assistance may be a lever by which the contributor secures and exercises control of the recipient and shapes the latter's policies to conform with its own. In that case, the relevant consideration is not the bare fact of aid, but the terms and conditions, if any, on which it is given. But, as the court below acknowledged (R. 2123), section 13(e)(3) does not direct the Board to consider the relevant factor of terms and conditions, but focuses exclusively on the irrelevant factor of aid.[21]

"Instruction and Training." Section 13(e)(4) directs the Board to consider "the extent to which" an accused organization "sends members or representatives to any foreign country for instruction or training in the principles, policies, strategy or tactics" of the world Communist movement, as described in section 2.

[21] By the logic of section 13(e)(3), the foreign aid programs of the United States are proof of the charge that it "dominates and controls" other governments. Those who make this charge (which our government denies) do not base it on the irrelevant factor of financial aid, but on the terms and conditions attached to the aid.

This test is irrational because it does not require a showing that the accused organization is obliged to or does conform to what is taught.

"Reporting." Section 13(e)(5) directs the board to consider "the extent to which" an accused organization "reports to" the Soviet Union or the foreign organization which assertedly controls the world Communist movement. This test is irrational because it makes "reporting" proof of foreign control without regard to the nature and content of the "report," the purpose for which it was given, or its use, if any, by the recipient. Labor, business, religious, scientific, cultural and political organizations customarily receive reports at their gatherings as a means of exchanging and sharing knowledge, experiences, and ideas. Under the preposterous theory of this subsection, those who report at such gatherings furnish evidence that they are "dominated and controlled" by the sponsoring organization.

"Discipline." Section 13(e)(6) directs the Board to consider "the extent to which" the organization's "principal leaders or a substantial number of its members are subject to or recognize the disciplinary power" of the alleged foreign principal. This standard permits the condemnation of the organization upon proof of the disciplinary status or subjective attitude of some of its leaders or members, notwithstanding that they may be an unrepresentative or dissenting minority and that the organization itself is completely independent.[22]

[22] In condemning a similar clause in the Mundt-Nixon bill, the antedecedent of the act, Mr. John W. Davis wrote the Senate Judiciary Committee in response to its request for his comments: "But assume, if you will that the organization contains some members or even some 'leaders' who * * * recognize the disciplinary power of such foreign government * * * how many or what proportion of such

"Secret Practices." Section 13(e)(7) directs the Board to consider "the extent to which" the accused organization conceals the identity of its members and the contents of its records, and otherwise operates on a secret basis "for the purpose of concealing foreign direction, domination or control, or of expediting or promoting its objectives."

This test is incapable of rational application. It makes "secret practices" relevant only if employed for the purpose of concealing foreign control or promoting the organization's objectives. The first of these purpose limitations involves circular reasoning, since foreign control is one of the ultimate facts to be established under section 3(3). Obviously, a standard whose application requires proof of an ultimate fact cannot be used to determine the existence of the ultimate fact. As to the second purpose limitation, if the reference is to promotion of the objectives attributed to the world Communist movement by section 2, then the same circuity exists. If, on the other hand, "objectives" embraces all possible organizational purposes, then the secrecy test has no rational relation to the ultimate fact to be proved.

"Allegiance." Section 13(e)(8) directs the Board to consider "the extent to which" the accused organization's "principal leaders or a substantial number of its members consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their obligations" to the Soviet Union or the foreign organization which allegedly controls the world Communist movement.

The "allegiance" test is completely subjective. It directs an inquiry into a pure state of mind. Moreover, the section assumes the facts prerequisite to the state of mind into which the Board is to inquire. It does not direct the individuals are to be held sufficient to color the entire organization? What is to be the status of a dissenting member, a minority of members or even a majority who do not hold such views? Are they and the organization to be condemned on the principle of noscitur a sociis, i.e., guilt by association?" Senate Hearings, supra, p. 421.

Board to determine whether any of the organization's leaders or members owe obligations to the Soviet Union or a foreign organization. It assumes that they do owe such obligations and confines the Board's inquiry to the question whether the leader or members "consider" these obligations subordinate to their allegiance to the United States. Furthermore, this section, like that on "discipline," imputes to the organization the state of mind of its "principal leaders or a substantial number of its members" although they may be an unrepresentative or dissenting minority and though the organization itself is completely loyal.

(c) The standards of section 13(e) are vague, as well as irrational. The Act nowhere indicates whether a registration order must be supported by adverse findings under all eight standards, or whether something less is sufficient. In this connection it is significant that the Mundt-Nixon bill, which was the antecedent of the Act, directed the Board to consider "some or all" of the evidentiary standards which it contained. The vagueness of this language was criticized as unconstitutional by Mr. Charles Evans Hughes, Jr., who was invited by the Senate Judiciary Committee to comment on the pending measure (Senate Hearings, supra, p. 417). Mr. Seth Richardson, who later served as the first Chairman of the Board, commented in response to the Committee's invitation that this language "leaves the measure of the envelopment of the particular organization in any of the activities noted, to depend largely on the particular cast of mind of whatever person the bill proposes shall reach the conclusion" (id., p. 445). It was apparently to avoid these criticisms that the words "some or all" were omitted from the bill as enacted. Clearly, however, this omission does not cure the defect, but only adds ambiguity to uncertainty.

The obscurity which thus envelops section 13(e) is made even more impenetrable by the phrase "the extent to which,"

which prefaces each of the eight standards. In commenting on this phrase, which appeared in the original Mundt-Nixon bill, Mr. John W. Davis stated: "Or take the introductory phrase itself as used throughout—'the extent to which, etc.'—what are the limits which these words envisage? To how great an extent, how customary a practice, how definite, pervasive, or continuous a policy? There would seem to be no room here for the application of any doctrine of de minimis." Mr. Davis concluded that the vagueness and uncertainty of the standards of the Mundt-Nixon Bill vitiated the entire bill. (Id., pp. 420-22.)

The foregoing examination of section 13(e) shows that it perverts the function of the orthodox legislative enumeration of factors to be taken into account by an administrative agency in reaching its determination. The legitimate role of such an enumeration is to give definite content to a generalized ultimate standard.[23] In the Act, however, the ultimate standards established by section 3(9) are definite and meaningful, so that no implementation by subsidiary criteria or guides is required. The sole function of the irrational and vague standards of 13(e) is to authorize petitioner's conviction of one thing on proof of another.

4. The Device of a Biased Tribunal.

In addition to predetermining the essential findings and establishing vague and irrational standards of proof, the Act establishes a Board which is necessarily under compelling pressure to decide against petitioner and whose members have a personal stake, financial and otherwise, in so deciding.

[23] For examples of legislation in which legislative guides were employed to give more definite content to generalized ultimate standards, see the statutes involved in Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414; Opp Cotton Mills, Inc. v. Administrator, 312 U. S. 126; Hampton, Jr. & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394; Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U. S. 381.

The Board is set up as a permanent agency, which originally had the sole function of identifying Communist-action organizations, their members, and Communist-front organizations. Since Communist-front organizations are by definition tools of a Communist-action organization, they can exist only if the Board finds that there is an action organization.[24]

The Act and its legislative history contemplate the existence in the United States of only one Communist-action organization, the petitioner (see supra, p. 44). And even if Congress had considered that there might be more than one, it is certain that it believed petitioner to be the principal organization of that character.

It is clear, therefore, that if the Board had decided that the petitioner was not a Communist-action organization, it would have prevented the Act from being applied to any organization at all. For there would be no other organization which could be charged with being a Communist-action organization and there could be no Communist-front organization.

This fact has been recognized by the Attorney General and the Board itself. Although the case against the petitioner was pending before the Board for over two years, the Attorney General instituted no proceeding during that time against any other organization. Yet only two days after the Board issued its decision against the petitioner, the Attorney General filed twelve petitions with the Board, all charging that the organizations named were Communist-front organizations controlled by the petitioner as a Communist-action organization. In the five years that the Act has been in existence, only one organization, the petitioner, has been charged before the Board with being a Communist-action organization.

[24] After the registration order was issued, the Communist Control Act gave the Board the additional function of identifying Communist-infiltrated organizations. The definition of the latter also presupposes the existence of a Communist-action organization (sec. 3(4A)).

The first two chairmen of the Board both advised Congressional appropriation committees that the continued functioning of the Board depended entirely upon the entry of a registration order against petitioner. The first chairman of the Board advised the appropriations committee:

> "Now, of course, the fundamental agency that covers all of these 130 organizations [on the Attorney General's list of 'subversive organizations'] is the Communist Party because they are all splinter groups from the Communist Party, and if the Communist Party is not found to be subversive then this splinter group cannot be so found." [25]

The second chairman of the Board informed the committee (emphasis supplied):

> "The Attorney General advises that some 25 petitions will be filed with the Board during the balance of this fiscal year in the event that the Board's final decision orders the Communist Party so to register." [26]

Thus it appears that the Board was told, in ex parte conversation with the only litigant empowered to initiate proceedings before it, that it would get additional business only if it decided for that litigant in the pending case against petitioner.

The following colloquy regarding the case against petitioner also occurred between a member of the appropriations sub-committee and the second chairman of the Board:

> "Mr. Cotton: The case is of paramount importance, upon which the whole structure rests, and without which there can be no structure.
> "Mr. Brown: Yes." [27]

[27] Id., pp. 198-199. For testimony to the same effect given by Mr. Brown a year earlier, see Hearings on Independent Offices Appro-

The "structure," of course, was the Board and the Act.

As its chairmen recognized, the Board, therefore, could not have decided in favor of the petitioner without rendering itself functus officio and, in effect, repealing the Act. It is inconceivable that an administrative agency would have the temerity to frustrate the will of Congress by repealing the Act which created it. Accordingly, irresistible pressure was exerted on the agency to decide in the only way which would preserve the Act and the agency—that is, against the petitioner.

The pressure on the Board to preserve itself and the Act by deciding against petitioner was intensified by considerations of personal interest. The members of the Board had to rule against petitioner if they were to have any further business and thus keep their jobs, salaries, and the appointment patronage available to them as heads of an agency. The Board's staff, including those employees who assisted the Board in analyzing the record and preparing the decision, had a similar job interest in seeing that the order was adverse to petitioner.

II. The Act Violates the Due Process Prohibition Against Fiat Legislation

Since the order of the Board deprives petitioner and its members of liberty and property, it may not constitutionally be entered without a hearing. Joint Anti Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123; Morgan v. United States, 304 U. S. 1. If any of the elements requisite to a determination of liability are found legislatively, rather than by means of the hearing, the due process clause has been violated. Manley v. Georgia, 279 U. S. 1; Western and Atlantic Railroad v. Henderson, 279 priations for 1953 before Subcommittee of Committee on Appropriations, H.R., 82d Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 245, 248 (Jan. 16, 1952).

U. S. 639; McFarland v. American Sugar Refining Co., 241 U. S. 79; Tot v. United States, 319 U. S. 463.

The Act violates due process because in two respects it legislatively determines elements essential to the issuance of a registration order against petitioner.

(1) As we have seen, it is uncontroverted that there has been a legislative predetermination of the existence, objectives and nature of a world Communist movement, which is binding on the Board and the courts. The court below so decided, and the Board conceded this to be the case in its brief (supra, p. 42).

The court below held (R. 2132) that this legislative predetermination was not a violation of due process for the reason that:

> "The rule, as we understand it, is that, if it appears Congress has power over the subject matter of a statute, and if the findings of fact are not baseless but are based on extensive investigation, the courts are to adopt these findings."

It is apparent, however, that the court relied on an inapplicable "rule." The principle to which it referred is applicable only to "legislative" as distinguished from "adjudicative" facts. As the Board itself has pointed out, a distinction must be made between "the legislative facts which reasonably tend to establish a situation which Congress, on investigation, has found to require legislative action, and the adjudicative facts which, on proof in adversary litigation, bring a specific organization or person within the purview of the legislation enacted." Due process, as the Board recognized, requires that in the administrative proceeding an organization "be allowed to litigate . . . the operative facts which bring it under the coverage of the Act." Legislative facts, on the other hand, "are general conclusions which support the policy of a particular law, and can be attacked only by showing that Congress acted arbitrarily or unreasonably, or beyond its delegated powers." [28]

The issue, therefore, is whether the existence, objectives and nature of the world Communist movement are legislative or adjudicative facts. Clearly they are the latter, since their existence is a prerequisite to bringing an organization under the coverage of the Act.

Petitioner has been ordered to register as a "Communist-action organization." The first component of the definition of such an organization is that it is the agent of the foreign government or foreign organization which controls "the world Communist movement referred to in section 2." The fact of such agency is obviously and concededly (R. 2118; Br. in Opp. to Cert., p. 15) an adjudicative or operative fact. Hence due process requires that petitioner be allowed to litigate the existence of this fact. But agency cannot exist without a principal. Therefore, due process requires that the petitioner be allowed to prove that there is no principal by showing that there is no world Communist movement as defined by section 2, and that consequently there is no foreign government or organization which controls that movement and can be the alleged principal.

The second half of the definition of a Communist-action organization is that it "operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement as referred to in section 2". Due process requires that petitioner be allowed to litigate the adjudicative or operative fact of whether it operates to advance the described objectives. This means that petitioner must be allowed to prove that it does not so operate because (a) there is no such world Communist movement, and hence there can be no such objectives; or (b) if there is a world Communist movement, it does not have the objectives ascribed to it, and hence petitioner can not operate to advance them.

Section 2, however, precludes petitioner from litigating any of the foregoing adjudicative facts. In short, petitioner has been ordered to register and label its publications and broadcasts as the agent of a foreign principal, without being allowed to prove the non-existence of this principal. It has been ordered to register (and label) as an organization which advances specified seditious objectives of a foreign movement, without being allowed to prove that the movement does not exist or does not have those objectives. Petitioner has, therefore, been foreclosed by legislative fiat from litigating adjudicative facts. This is a palpable violation of due process.

(2) As we have seen, the Act not only predetermines the "facts" concerning "the world Communist movement," but also finds the existence of a domestic organization having the characteristics of a Communist-action organization and identifies petitioner as that organization. It is true that findings as to these facts, unlike the findings as to the world Communist movement, are ostensibly left to administrative determination. But, as we have pointed out, the distinction is of no consequence (supra, pp. 43-44). Hence the Act violates due process by effectively removing from independent adjudication the identity of petitioner as a Communist-action organization.

The court below answered this contention on the grounds (R. 2116) that "Petitioner is not mentioned." But the fact that petitioner is not referred to by name in the text of the Act is an irrelevancy in the face of the facts that section 2 makes findings as to the existence and characteristics of a domestic Communist-action organization, that it unequivocally identifies petitioner as this organization, and that the name itself was supplied by the legislative history.

Moreover, section 4 of the Communist Control Act declares petitioner by name to be a Communist-action organization. The purpose and intended effect of that section, enacted while this proceeding was pending below, was to influence the court below to affirm the Board's order. So far as petitioner and its members are concerned, section 4 has no other conceivable function. And the Congressional debates are replete with exhortations as to the necessity for judicial affirmance of the order of the Board. (See, e.g., 100 Cong. Rec., pp. 13849, 13945, 13956, daily pagination.) If courts are not susceptible to such pressure, section 4 has nevertheless effectively destroyed petitioner's constitutional right to judicial review of the administrative action. Inherent in that right is the assurance that in the event of a remand the petitioner can secure a fair administrative redetermination. If that were possible before the enactment of section 4 (and it was not), it is clearly impossible now.

Section 2 differs from a conventional legislative preamble in two vital respects. (1) Its findings concerning the world Communist movement are incorporated into the definition and the evidentiary standards of the Act as assumptions of fact which the Board is required to accept. (2) Other findings of section 2 which identify petitioner as the Communist-action organization in the United States are on the precise issues which are ostensibly to be adjudicated by the Board, so that the Board could not have decided in favor of petitioner without overruling Congress. The Act thus violates due process because it legally removes from administrative adjudication the operative facts concerning the world Communist movement and in fact removes from administrative adjudication the existence and identity of the organization within the Act's coverage.

III. The Act Is a Bill of Attainder

"A bill of attainder is a legislative Act which inflicts punishment without judicial trial." Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 277, 323. As stated in United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303, 315, and repeated in Garner v. Board of Public Works, 341 U. S. 716, 722:

> "... legislative acts, no matter what their form, that apply either to named individuals or to easily ascertainable members of a group in such a way as to inflict punishment on them without a judicial trial, are bills of attainder prohibited by the Constitution."

The Act, as we have seen, determines petitioner's guilt by legislative fiat and identifies petitioner and its members as the objects of statutory sanctions. But even if it is assumed, arguendo, that the Board was free to make an independent determination, still the Act denies petitioner a judicial trial and imposes sanctions on "easily ascertainable members of a group." For petitioner is accorded only an administrative hearing, not a judicial trial, and the Act imposes various sanctions on the organization identified by the registration order and on its members. Accordingly, if the registration order and the sanctions on organizations and their members "inflict punishment," the Act meets the definition of a bill of attainder and is invalid.

The distinction which must be made is between "regulation" of future conduct, which may constitutionally be imposed through the administrative process, and "punishment" of past conduct, the infliction of which requires a judicial trial. Clearly the Act does inflict punishment and does not regulate. The Act makes compliance with a registration order impossible (supra, pp. 28-33). Hence there can be no "regulation" through disclosure, and none was intended. The purpose of regulation is to confine an organization to non-deleterious conduct. But a registration order prevents the organization from engaging in any activity, however innocent and beneficial. It imposes a death sentence on the organization, and this is as obviously penal as execution of an individual.

The sanctions individually, as well as in their cumulative impact, are also penal. Compelling the organization publicly to brand itself and its members by registering both as seditious conspirators has the punitive function of the pillory. The requirements for the invidious labelling of literature and broadcasts are punitive because their function is to stigmatize the organization and deny it an audience, regardless of the content of the material. Non-punitive regulation could be made only on the basis of content, as when obscene or lewd literature is barred. Cf. Donaldson v. Read Magazine, 333 U. S. 178, 191-192. Similarly, the limitation on financial contributions to the organization, regardless of their purpose and use, is punitive because its only effect is to injure, not to keep activities within proper bounds.

The Act deprives the organization's members of numerous privileges and subjects them to serious disabilities, regardless of their individual fitness to enjoy the privileges denied them. Since Cummings, it has been clear that the deprivation of privileges constitutes punishment if the grounds for deprivation have no reasonable relation to the fitness of persons to utilize or enjoy the privileges.[29] Under the Act, members of petitioner are conclusively determined to be unfit and ineligible to hold public office, a wide range of private employment, and passports. These disabilities are imposed solely because of association, without reference to the fitness of the individuals to enjoy these privileges if judged on their own merits as individuals, and even without regard to their lack of knowledge of the allegedly evil character of the organization. (See infra, pp. 72-75.)

The nature, number, and destructive impact of the sanctions on members, and their setting in the Act, demonstrate that they are punishment. They go far beyond the single, limited "loss of position" which American Communications

Association v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 413, 414, held was intended merely "to forestall future dangerous acts."

A member of the organization can escape the disabilities by leaving it. But a forced deprivation of the privilege of association is itself punishment. As Cummings held (at 324): "These bills may inflict punishment absolutely, or may inflict it conditionally." Douds stated (at 413-14) that such an escape possibility is an indication that a sanction is not punishment. But this is contrary to Cummings and is logically and historically unsound. The possibility of escaping punishment by recantation does not negative the fact of punishment. If Congress were to place special disabilities on members of a particular religion the legislation would be invalid as a bill of attainder even though the members could avoid the disabilities by abandoning their church.

Moreover, if the members of an organization escape the Act's sanctions by leaving it, then by that fact alone the organization is destroyed. The organization has no escape from the registration death sentence which the Act visits against it. Hence the comment in Douds, even if correct, has no bearing on the attainder of the organization.

The Act has all the historical earmarks and practical effects of bills of attainder. They are characteristic of periods of savage political intolerance and hysteria. See Story's Commentaries, sec. 1344. They commonly represent a charge made by an angry and vindictive legislature of subverting the government or engaging in acts claimed to be prejudicial to the national security. See, e.g., bills attainting the Earl of Strafford, 3 How. St. Tr. 1382, 1518; Earl of Clarendon, 3 How. St. Tr. 318, 392; Bishop of Rochester, 16 How. St. Tr. 323; Archbishop Laud, 4 How. St. Tr. 598, 599. They are used where the evidence is insufficient to prove guilt or where the government is not satisfied with the severity of the punishment conventionally imposed for an offense. Woodeson, Law Lectures (1792), 653 ff.; Miller, Lectures on Constitution of the United States (1893) 584. As we have seen, these are precisely the considerations which inspired the Act and determined its form.

IV. The Irrational and Vague Criteria of Section 13(e) Violate Due Process

1. Section 13(e) establishes rules of evidence which authorize the Board to infer that an organization is a Communist-action organization from the fact that it engages in one or more of eight practices. We have already seen that these practices are not relevant to the ultimate issues defined by section 3(3). The presumptions established by section 13(e) therefore violate due process.

Congress has the power to prescribe rules of evidence, including presumptions, in judicial or administrative proceedings. But that power is limited by the due process clause, which forbids the substitution of legislative fiat for proof. As stated in Tot v. United States, 319 U. S. 463, 467:

> "But the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments set limits upon the power of Congress or that of a state legislature to make the proof of one fact or group of facts evidence of the existence of the ultimate fact on which guilt is predicated . . . . Under our decisions, a statutory presumption cannot be sustained if there be no rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed, if the inference of the one from proof of the other is arbitrary because of lack of connection between the two in common experience."

And as stated in Manley v. Georgia, 279 U. S. 1, 6:

> "A statute creating a presumption that is arbitrary or that operates to deny a fair opportunity to repel it violates the due process clause."

Accordingly, the legislature may validly establish a presumption of fact only (1) if there is a rational connection between the fact to be proved and the ultimate fact to be presumed, and (2) if the presumption is not made conclusive of the rights of the person against whom it is raised. Manley v. Georgia, supra; Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485, 496; Tot v. United States, supra; Western & Atlantic Railroad v. Henderson, 279 U. S. 639; McFarland v. American Sugar Co., 241 U. S. 79; Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219.

Section 13(e) violates both of the due process tests established by these decisions. First, as our analysis has shown, the presumptions created by section 13(e) are arbitrary and unreasonable (supra, pp. 46-52).

Second, the presumptions established by section 13(e) are not prima facie, as were those in the cited cases, but conclusive. The section does not permit the accused organization to show that the context in which the enumerated practices occurred negatives any rational inference that the organization is under foreign control or operates to effectuate the seditious objectives described in section 2. Nor does the section seem to permit the Board to "take into consideration" matters other than those enumerated. The Board's Report indicates that the Board considered the 13(e) criteria to exclude all matters not within their scope.

The court below attempted to meet our attack on section 13(e) by stating (R. 2120):

> "The statute says nothing about presumptions * * *. The section is a catalog of some basic considerations. There are no statutory presumptions."

Obviously, however, as the Tot line of cases makes perfectly plain, a statutory presumption is a grant of authority to infer an ultimate fact from proof of other facts. This is exactly what section 13(e) does.

The court below also held that any defect in the section 13(e) standards is not fatal because the "catalog in Section 13(e) is not exclusive" (R. 2119). That assertion, even if true, would not save the Act. The fact that the Act authorizes the Board to decide on the basis of irrational standards is enough to invalidate it.[30] As stated in Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 235:

> "It is not sufficient to declare that the statute does not make it the duty of the jury to convict, where there is no other evidence but the breach of the contract and the failure to pay the debt. The point is that, in such case, the statute authorizes the jury to convict. It is not enough that the jury may not accept that evidence as alone sufficient; for the jury may accept it, and they have the express warrant of the statute to accept as a basis for their verdict. And it is in this light that the validity of the statute must be determined." (Emphasis in original.)

The fact is that the Act is invalid if any one of the standards of 13(e) is irrelevant to the ultimate issue. This appears not only from Bailey v. Alabama, but from the elementary logic that if any one of the propositions from which a conclusion is drawn is not valid, then the conclusion itself has not been demonstrated valid. Yet, as we have seen, the Board acknowledged below, and the court agreed, that while section 3(3) defines a Communist-action organization as one which promotes the seditious objectives attributed to the world Communist movement by section 2, section 13(e) authorizes the Board to issue a registration order without any proof whatsoever that the accused organization promotes these objectives. It is unnecessary to go beyond this single irrationality, the fact of which is not contested, to conclude that the Act is invalid.

[30] Furthermore, the Board rested its decision exclusively on the standards of 13(e). See infra, pp. 120-58.

> "The Party says that by the definition in Section 2 of the statute the world Communist movement engages in espionage, treason, etc., whereas none of the eight 'tests' to be applied to a domestic organization involves any of those offenses; and that thus the whole of Section 13(e) is irrational. The argument misconceives both the text and the purpose of the section. The inquiry with which the statute as a whole is concerned is in two separate parts: (a) What is the world Communist movement? That is dealt with in Section 2. (b). Is a certain domestic organization under the domination and control of that movement, and does it operate primarily to achieve its objectives? * * *. The so-called 'tests' in section 13(e) are directed at the latter problem alone. Thus construed, as it obviously was intended to be, the section is apt and cogent."

This passage begs the questions. If one of the issues of "the latter problem" is whether the domestic organization operates to achieve the objectives of the world Communist movement, all of which, as enumerated in section 2, are seditious and unlawful, that issue cannot rationally be resolved against the organization by proof that it operates to achieve only benign and lawful objectives.

The court below shifted its position when it discussed the "directives and policies" test of section 13(e)(1), stating (R. 2121):

> "The Party says that the 'directives and policies test' in Section 13(e)(1) is irrational. It says that the statutory definition of a Communist-action organization in Section 3(3) refers only to organizations which pursue objectives which are 'evil', whereas the test section refers to any objectives, good or bad.
> "The crucial factor in the statute before us is the aim, spelled out in detail, of the world Communist movement to disestablish our system of government. Our government may well oppose the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship of the sort described in the definition, even if such a dictatorship does not meet the definition of 'evil' or even if it has many beneficent features."

But if "the crucial factor in the statute" is the alleged aim of the world Communist movement to disestablish our system of government, an accused organization cannot rationally be found to be a "Communist-action" organization in the absence of proof that it is engaged in promoting that aim. Yet no such proof is required by section 13(e) or by any other section.

Moreover, the "crucial factor in the statute" is not simply the aim of the postulated world Communist movement to disestablish our system of government, but to do so by violent and unlawful means (e.g., sec. 2(6), (15)). Indeed it is only the latter factor which can support the finding of section 2(15) that the American agent of the postulated world Communist movement presents "a clear and present danger to the security of the United States." Accordingly, an organization which operates to bring about a change in the existing social order in this country by peaceable and constitutional means cannot be a Communist-action organization. Yet none of the standards of section 13(e) requires proof that an organization operates to bring about social change through the use of violent or unconstitutional means. There is, therefore, no rational relation between the finding that an organization is a Communist-action organization and the evidence upon which the Act authorizes the Board to predicate the finding.

2. The internal vagueness of the tests of section 13(e) (supra, pp. 52-53) strips it of any ascertainable standard of judgment. In the words of the first chairman of the Board, section 13(e) commits the decision to "the particular cast of mind of whatever person the bill proposes shall reach the conclusion" (supra, p. 52).

Such an unfettered delegation of power violates due process and Article I, section 1 of the Constitution. Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495; Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507; Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U. S. 268; Kunz v.

New York, 340 U. S. 290; Musser v. Utah, 333 U. S. 95; Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359; Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242; Connally v. General Construction Company, 269 U. S. 385; United States v. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U. S. 81; Small v. American Sugar Refining Co., 267 U. S. 233; International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U. S. 216; Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U. S. 451; Champlin Refining Co. v. Commission, 286 U. S. 210; Cline v. Frink Dairy Co., 274 U. S. 445; Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U. S. 188; Schechter Corp. v. United States, 295 U. S. 495.

In the cited cases, criminal and regulatory statutes containing far more definite and ascertainable standards than section 13(e) were invalidated for their failure to measure up to this essential requirement of due process. The presence of narrowly drawn and definite standards is of special importance where, as here the conduct subject to regulation lies in the preferred area guarded by the First Amendment. Burstyn v. Wilson; Winters v. New York; Niemotko v. Maryland; Kunz v. New York; Stromberg v. California; Herndon v. Lowry, all supra.

In Winters, Mr. Justice Reed prophetically wrote (at 518):

> "The present case as to a vague statute abridging free speech involves the circulation of only vulgar magazines. The next may call for decision as to free expression of political views in the light of a statute intended to punish subversive activities."

This is the "next case" anticipated in Winters. If political expression is to be protected by the same due process standard that safeguards vulgar magazines, the Act must be condemned for failure to meet that standard.

V. The Act Violates Due Process by Establishing a Board Which Is Necessarily Biased and Has an Interest in the Event.

As we have shown (supra, pp. 53-56), the structure of the Act insured that the Board would be inevitably biased against petitioner. The Board could not have decided in favor of petitioner without rendering itself functus officio and, in effect, repealing the Act. Moreover, the Board members had a personal interest in ruling against petitioner in order to keep their jobs, salaries, and appointment patronage.

By establishing a tribunal which was subject to irresistible pressures to decide in one direction, and which necessarily had a personal interest in the outcome of the proceeding, the Act denied the petitioner a fair hearing and thus deprived it of due process of law. "When the Constitution requires a hearing, it requires a fair one, one before a tribunal which meets at least currently prevailing standards of impartiality." Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U. S. 33, 50. "Trial must be held before a tribunal not biased by interest in the event." Fay v. New York, 332 U. S. 261, 288. "Fairness of course requires an absence of bias in the trial of cases. But our system of law has always endeavored to prevent even the probability of unfairness. To this end no man can be a judge in his own case and no man is permitted to try cases where he has an interest in the outcome." In re Murchison, 349 U. S. 133, 136.

The fact that the Board members had a personal, financial stake—the keeping of their salaried jobs—in finding against the petitioner, as well as an official stake in preserving the Act and the Board, made the Board an incompetent tribunal. Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U. S. 510, flatly holds that it is a violation of due process to commit adjudication to one who has either a financial or official stake in the outcome of the case. The Court stated (at 532):

> "Every procedure which would offer a possible temptation to the average man as a judge to forget the burden of proof required to convict the defendant, or which might lead him not to hold the balance nice, clear and true between the state and the accused denies the latter due process of law."

The jobs of the members of the Board staff, including those who assisted the Board in preparing the decision, were also staked on a decision adverse to the petitioner. The Board's reliance on such interested staff members in reaching its decision was at least as unfair as if it had utilized findings prepared by the active prosecutors for the government after an ex parte discussion which the petitioner had no opportunity to meet. Yet the latter procedure was held in Morgan v. United States, 304 U. S. 1, 22, to vitiate adjudication as "a vital defect."

In the Fay case supra, at 288, the Court recognized that a system of jury selection "could be so manipulated as to call a jury before which defendants would have so little chance of a decision on the evidence that it would constitute a denial of due process." The statute here so manipulates the character of the Board that petitioner had no chance at all of a decision on the evidence.

The Act embodies a much greater tampering with the administrative judgment than anything the Attorney General was alleged to have done in United States ex rel. Accardi v. Shaughnessy, 347 U. S. 260. Congress not only listed the petitioner as an "unsavory" organization marked for registration, but also made the Board's tenure of office and the continued existence of the Act dependent on an administrative determination adverse to petitioner. Under these circumstances the denial of due process is patent.

VI. The Act Deprives Petitioner's Members of Liberty and Property Without Due Process of Law.

As we have seen (supra, pp. 29-32), a final registration order will result in intolerable sanctions on petitioner's members. The names of the members must be registered on an opprobrious list, either by the organization or themselves. The members are barred from virtually all employment, public and private. They are denied the right to travel abroad. Naturalized members may lose their citizenship.

The rights, privileges, and interest in reputation of which the members are deprived clearly constitute "liberty and property," protected by the due process clause.[31] Since the disabilities imposed on the members directly affect and injure petitioner, petitioner has standing to challenge their validity. For the test of standing is whether the action challenged substantially affects the interests of the complainant in a reasonably direct manner. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123, 152-154, 187.[32]

The Act deprives the organization's members of constitutionally protected rights and privileges solely because of the fact of membership. The Act thus represents an extreme case of imposing liability on individuals not for their misconduct, but solely because of their association.[33] It does so, moreover, without regard to the member's lack of knowledge of the claimed illicit purposes of the organization. Yet exclusion even from public employment cannot be imposed for organizational membership in the absence of such scienter on the part of the individual. Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183.

S. 123; Schachtman v. Dulles, App. D. C., No. 12,406, decided June 23, 1955. We recognize that Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, is decisive of the validity of the deportation and exclusion sanctions. Although the case seems to us to be wrongly decided, we do not press the argument as to those sanctions.

[32] And cf. Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (school permitted to challenge statute depriving pupils of due process); Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33 (employee permitted to challenge statute depriving employer of due process); Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60 (white grantor permitted to challenge statute depriving Negro grantee of due process); Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U. S. 249 (white grantor permitted to assert as defense constitutional right of Negro grantee).

Furthermore, in Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485, the Court unequivocally ruled that an individual could not be barred from teaching in the public schools even for knowing membership in a seditious organization unless he had an opportunity to prove that notwithstanding his membership he was fit to be a school teacher. The Court stated (at 495) that the statute involved was valid because the presumption of ineligibility arising from knowing membership "is not conclusive but arises only in a hearing where the person against whom it may arise has the full opportunity to rebut it." The Court added (at 496, emphasis supplied):

> "Where, as here, the relation between the fact found and the presumption is clear and direct and is not conclusive, the requirements of due process are satisfied."

Since the Act does not require scienter for the application of its sanctions against members, it is denounced by Wieman. Since, in addition, it makes conclusive a presumption of unfitness arising from membership, it is denounced by Adler.

The court below held that the scienter requirement of Wieman was satisfied on the grounds that (1) a member has knowledge of his membership; and (2), "The statute before us requires that before these sanctions apply a member must have 'knowledge or notice' that the organization has registered or been finally ordered to register" (R. 2103). These grounds are both irrelevant and inaccurate.

As Wieman makes abundantly clear, the scienter required by due process is personal knowledge that the organization has deleterious purposes. The requirement is not satisfied by knowledge of membership. Nor is it satisfied by knowledge or notice that the organization has been governmentally condemned. Moreover, in a case arising under the Act, knowledge that an organization has been found to have seditious or otherwise evil purposes cannot be inferred from knowledge that it has been ordered to register. For the court below held that a registration order may be issued without proof of such purposes (see supra, p. 46).

Furthermore, the court misread the statute in stating that knowledge or notice of a registration order is a prerequisite to the imposition of the sanctions. Under the Act, such notice[34] is necessary to support criminal prosecutions for applying for a forbidden job or a passport or for a member's failure to register himself if the organization failed to list him (secs. 5(a), 6(a), 8(b), 15(a)(2)). But this limited "scienter" is not necessary to the imposition of the civil sanctions and disabilities of the Act. For employers must deny a member employment and the government must withhold a passport from him, without reference to any kind of knowledge or notice on his part (secs. 6(b) and 5(a)(2)).

Finally, in view of the vague criteria of membership established by section 5 of the Communist Control Act, it is not true that "members" have knowledge of their membership. (See infra, pp. 75-82.)

[34] Under section 14(k), notice of a registration order is given to members by publication in the Federal Register of the fact that the order has become final.

The sanctions which the Act imposes on the members also violate the due process principle that a regulatory law "shall not be unreasonable, arbitrary or capricious, and that the means selected shall have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be obtained." See Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502, 525. As we later show (infra, pp. 100-05), the sanctions are arbitrary and do not have a real and substantial relation to any objective within the competence of the federal government.

VII. The Act Violates Due Process Because It Is Impossible Under Section 5 of the Communist Control Act to Determine Who Are Members of the Petitioner.

The Act makes it necessary for petitioner and its officers to determine who are members of petitioner. If the order of the Board becomes final, petitioner and its officers will be required to list the names of all the members in petitioner's registration statement (sec. 7(d)(4)). Other persons must determine whether they are members of petitioner in order to know whether they may lawfully hold certain jobs, apply for passports, or obtain naturalization. They must make the same determination in order to know whether they must register themselves upon the failure of the organization to file a registration statement listing their names.

Section 5 of the Communist Control Act (50 U.S.C. 844) sets forth criteria for determining membership in the Communist Party and makes the rule of evidence which it thus establishes applicable to all court proceedings where such membership is in issue. Accordingly, in preparing petitioner's registration statement, petitioner and its officers must apply the criteria of section 5 of the Communist Control Act if they are to avoid the criminal penalties of section 15 of the Act for failure to list a member or for making a false listing. Other persons must similarly apply the section 5 criteria if they are not to incur the penalties of section 15 for engaging in conduct forbidden to members of Communist-action organizations and for failure to register themselves if petitioner does not list their names.

Section 5, however, prescribes such vague and irrational criteria that it is impossible for petitioner, its officers or others to determine the identity of petitioner's members. Moreover, the application of these criteria requires a knowledge of facts which petitioner and its officers cannot have or obtain. Section 5 thus unsettles and invalidates the Act as a whole, including the registration requirements.

Section 5 provides that "in determining membership or participation in the Communist Party or any other organization defined in this Act, or knowledge of the purpose or objective of such party or organization, the jury, under instructions from the court, shall consider evidence, if presented" as to 13 separate critera enumerated in the section. Even before examining the 13 criteria which follow, the introductory provision which we have quoted demonstrates that the entire section is invalid for two reasons.

In the first place, the quoted provision does not make the rule of evidence enunciated in section 5 applicable to prove membership in all organizations, but only in the Communist Party and in organizations which seek to effectuate the violent overthrow of the government. Obviously, there can be no rational basis for this classification.

Secondly, it appears from the introductory provision of section 5 that evidence as to one or more of the thirteen criteria of that section are admissible to prove indiscriminately (1) membership in petitioner, (2) "participation" in the petitioner, and (3) knowledge of the purpose or objective of the petitioner. Surely the identical criteria cannot rationally prove all three of these relationships, which involve entirely different concepts. Participation may exist without membership; knowledge of purpose may exist without either membership or participation; and membership or participation may exist without knowledge of purpose. A priori, before examining the individual criteria, it is apparent that a system of proof which equates membership, participation and knowledge of purpose must either be wholly irrational or based on vague and indefinite evidentiary standards or both.

Turning to the thirteen criteria themselves, it should first be noted that none of them is limited as to time. Any conduct within one of the criteria serves as evidence of present membership irrespective of the fact that it occurred in the remote past. Such a rule of evidence is patently irrational.

Under paragraphs (5) and (7) of section 5, a court and jury may infer membership in petitioner from the fact that the individual in question has acted in any capacity "in behalf of" petitioner or "has been accepted to his knowledge * * * as one to be called upon for services" by petitioner's officers or members. Under these paragraphs the fact that a person supplies professional or business services to the petitioner or that his services are recommended by the petitioner or its members furnishes evidence that he is a "member" of petitioner. Under paragraph (2), a person who lends money to petitioner, regardless of the purpose and terms of the loan (including, for example, a mortgagee, or seller of goods on a running account) likewise furnishes such evidence.

Under paragraphs (6) and (11) membership may be inferred from the fact that the individual in question has "conferred with" officers or members of petitioner "in behalf of any plan or enterprise" of petitioner or "has advised, counseled or in any way imparted information, suggestions [or] recommendations" to any of petitioner's officers or members "in behalf of the objectives" of petitioner. As the Report of the Board acknowledges (R. 77), the petitioner is engaged in carrying out "plans" and "enterprises" and in achieving "objectives" which are not only innocent but directed toward desirable social reforms, including the promotion of the trade union movement, the enactment of improved social security and welfare legislation, the elimination of discrimination against the Negro people, etc. Yet under paragraphs (6) and (11) any person who consults or advises with any officer or member of petitioner with reference to these praiseworthy "plans," "enterprises' or "objectives" thereby furnishes evidence that he is a member of petitioner.

Paragraphs (4), (9), (10), (11), (12), and (13) eliminate contact or communication between the individual in question and officers or members of the petitioner as a requisite to evidence of membership. Under these paragraphs, the holding of views similar to those expressed by Communists or even an attitude of receptivity to the views of Communists is made evidence of membership. These paragraphs permit a finding of membership from the fact that the individual in question:

1. Has executed plans of any kind of the petitioner (paragraph (4)).

2. Has prepared or circulated any written material "in behalf of the objectives and purposes" of petitioner (paragraphs (9) and (10)).

3. Has imparted information, suggestions, or recommendations to anyone "in behalf of the objectives" of the petitioner (paragraph (11)).

4. Has indicated in any way "a willingness to carry out in any manner and to any degree the plans, designs, objectives, or purposes" of the petitioner (paragraph (12)).

5. Has "in any other way participated in the activities, planning, actions, objectives, or purposes of the organization" (paragraph (13)).

Under these paragraphs, anyone who has ever expressed a view or taken a position on any public question which is similar to the view or position taken by the petitioner, thereby furnishes evidence of his membership in petitioner. If he even so much as attends a public meeting called by petitioner or purchases a piece of its literature, he may be found, by that fact, to have indicated a willingness to carry out its plans, and hence to have supplied evidence of "membership." Indeed, since petitioner holds meetings with the purpose of attracting the public and publishes literature with the purpose of securing readers, attendance at a meeting or the purchase of literature ipso facto executes petitioner's "plan" to gain an audience.[35]

Under paragraph (8), a court and jury may consider as evidence of membership the fact that an individual has communicated in any way or form "orders, directives or plans" of the petitioner. A newspaper reporter who writes a story from one of petitioner's press releases, reports a speech by one of its officers, or purports to "expose" its plans thereby furnishes evidence of his "membership" in petitioner.

In short, under the criteria of section 5, almost anyone may be found to be a member of petitioner.[36] For this [35] Commenting on section 5, the Newark Ledger stated, "Such a law might be used to herd into prison thousands of persons who have never been Communists and who have no basic sympathy with the Communist conspiracy." 100 Cong. Rec. p. 14399. The Wall Street Journal said, "One of these provisions is that it would be evidence of cooperation with the Communist groups if any person has indicated a willingness to carry out aims and purposes of the party. For all we know the Communist Party may be against juvenile delinquency. So is this newspaper." Id., 14400.

[36] Counsel for petitioner apparently satisfy almost all of the thirteen criteria of membership merely by fulfilling their professional responsibilities in this case. In preparing our briefs and making our arguments, we have "executed * * * plans of any kind" of the petitioner, namely its plan to have the respondent's order set aside and thereby to survive (4th test). We have by our appearance before the Board and the courts "acted * * * in any * * * capacity in behalf reason alone the officers of petitioner cannot possibly comply with the membership listing requirement. Moreover, they cannot even attempt to apply the criteria of section 5 because these involve considerations of the past and present conduct and state of mind of others which petitioner and its officers cannot conceivably know or ascertain. How, for example, is an officer to know all the individuals who ever "indicated * * * in any * * * way a willingness to carry out in any manner and to any degree the plans, designs, objectives or purposes" of petitioner (paragraph (12))?

If the order of the Board becomes final, petitioner and its officers can be punished by a $10,000 fine and five years' imprisonment for each member omitted from the registration statement (section 15(b) of the Act). But since they have no way of knowing whom to register, they are hope-of" petitioner (5th test). Naturally, we have "conferred with officers or other members" of our client, again "in behalf of" the "plan or enterprise" of getting the respondent's order set aside (6th test). By preparing our briefs, including this one, we have "prepared documents" in behalf of the petitioner's "objectives and purposes" (9th test). By delivering our briefs to the courts as well as by giving copies to other lawyers, we have "delivered to others material * * * of any kind in behalf of" the petitioner (10th test). We have "counseled" and otherwise "imparted information, suggestions, recommendations" about this case to officers of the petitioner and to the Court ("anyone else") in behalf of petitioner's objective to have the respondent's order set aside (11th test). We have, by accepting this case, "indicated by word, action, conduct, writing or in any other way a willingness to carry out in any manner and to any degree the plans, designs, objectives or purposes of the" petitioner (12th test). By our participation in this case we have "in any * * * way participated in the activities, planning, actions, objectives, or purposes of the" petitioner (13th test). If our fee is too modest, it may be that we have made a "financial contribution * * * in any * * * form" (2d test). And because lawyers are obliged to accept instructions from clients, perhaps we have, by representing petitioner, made ourselves "subject to the discipline of the organization in any form whatsoever" (3d test). If our client is sufficiently impressed by our legal abilities to recommend our professional services to those of its members who need lawyers, we meet the seventh test.

Any person whom the petitioner might register as a member would immediately incur public infamy and the ruinous sanctions of the Act. True, he could request the Attorney General to remove his name from the registration list on the ground that he was not a member, and institute a proceeding before the Board for that purpose if the Attorney General failed for five months to act favorably (secs. 7(g) and 9(b)). However, it is difficult to conceive that the individual so listed could prove that he was not a member in the light of the criteria of section 5, and particularly in view of paragraph (1) of that section which makes the appearance of his name on petitioner's registration statement evidence of his membership.

The situation of such an individual is scarcely less difficult even if he convinces the Attorney General or the Board that he is not a member and therefore should have his name stricken from the list. For in view of the repeal of 5(c) and 6(c) of the original Act by 7(c) of the Communist Control Act, he will have incurred the employment and passport sanctions of the Act from the moment that the registration statement was filed until the time when his name is stricken from the list. The patient dies before the doctor arrives.

A person whose name is not registered by petitioner is in a dilemma. He cannot possibly determine from section 5 whether he will be found to be a member or not. He must therefore choose between the risk of prosecution for not registering, and the certainty of losing his livelihood and becoming a pariah by registering.

If such an individual decides not to register, he must of course take every precaution to avoid doing anything that can be used as evidence of membership. He must not express a view on any question until he has first ascertained petitioner's position. Thereafter, he must either give voice to the contrary opinion or remain silent. He must abstain from association or communication with any person who is a member of petitioner. And since he has no way of determining who may be found to be a member, he must shun association or communication with all men. Prudence therefore dictates that he live the life of a hermit. But there is no safety for him even in that course. Since the criteria of section 5 are unlimited as to time, he may be dragged from his hermitage to be tried and convicted on the basis of some incident in his remote past.

Our description of the consequences of the membership criteria of section 5 is not the product of a lawyer's imagination run riot. Congressional Committees and Loyalty Boards have blasted the reputations and ruined the careers of hundreds of individuals and frightened thousands of others into silence by using precisely the same criteria to identify and expose "Communists." Indeed, the authors of the Communist Control Act merely borrowed this technique of McCarthyism, wrote it into law and implemented it with the intolerable sanctions of the Act.

The court below dismissed the Communist Control Act with the statement (R. 2125), "We think it has no application." As to section 5, at least, the statement is plainly erroneous. In the language of the opinion (R. 2082) the criteria of section 5 are clearly "attachments" of registration.

VIII. The Act Violates the Constitutional Privilege Against Self-Incrimination.

The registration of the organization must, of course, be accomplished by one or more individuals. The Act provides that the persons required to sign and file the registration forms for the organization shall be those specified in regulations to be issued by the Attorney General (secs. 7(d) and (h)). These regulations require the registration statement to be signed by the organization's principal officers and all the members of its governing board. 28 C. F. R. 11.205. If the organization does not register, or if its registration omits the names of any members, the members must register themselves (sec. 8). Failure of the officers to register the organization or of individual members to register themselves when and as required is punishable by astronomical penalties, which accumulate at the rate of five years imprisonment and $10,000 for each day that the failure continues (sec. 15).

The legislative scheme of the Act culminates, therefore, in an attempt to coerce confessions of membership in the Communist Party and participation in the alleged criminal conspiracy described in section 2 and punishable under section 4(a).

It is obvious, as the majority below acknowledged (R. 2096), that any person who signed petitioner's registration statement as an officer of the organization and gave the information required by section 7 would thereby admit his membership in the Communist Party and an "intimate knowledge of its workings." Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159, 161. He would necessarily, therefore, furnish "a link in the chain of evidence needed in a prosecution" (ibid.) of himself under section 4(a) of the Act, as well as under the Smith Act and a long series of other federal criminal statutes.[37]

The Court has held, however, that an admission of membership in the Communist Party, without more, is protected by the privilege against self-incrimination, Blau v. United States, supra; Quinn v. United States, 349 U. S. 155. The Act is thus a crude invasion of the Fifth Amendment privilege.

In an effort to avoid the patent unconstitutionality of compelling self-incrimination by the device of registration, the Act contains a so-called "immunity" provision. Section 4(f) provides that the holding of office or membership in a Communist organization shall not, per se, constitute a violation of section 4(a) or any other criminal law, and that the fact of registration of any person under sections 7 and 8 shall not be admissible in a prosecution under section 4(a) or for any other crime.

While this provision tacitly recognizes the vulnerability of the Act,[38] it does not save it. The immunity which it confers does not comprehend all matters which the compelled admissions concern. The immunity of section 4(f) is therefore not coextensive with the constitutional privilege and does not affect it. Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547; United States v. Bryan, 339 U. S. 323.

The majority below held that the privilege against self-incrimination is not available to petitioner's officers and, in any event, that its assertion at this time is premature. An analysis of the grounds for these conclusions demonstrates that they are erroneous and that Judge Bazelon's dissent, holding the Act unconstitutional, correctly states the law.

1. The majority below held (R. 2093-2094) on the authority of United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694, that petitioner's officers could not avail themselves of the privilege as a defense against a prosecution for failure to register. The White case, however, is inapplicable for two reasons.

In the first place, that case, and Wilson v. United States, 221 U. S. 361, which it followed, simply decided that the privilege is not available to the officers of a corporation or unincorporated association as a defense against a subpoena duces tecum ordering them to produce the records of the organization. In both cases, the Court emphasized that no question of an attempt to compel testimony from the officers was involved.[39] Likewise, in Shapiro v. United States, 335 U. S. 1, holding that the privilege does not protect individuals against the compelled production of "required records" and hence that such production does not confer immunity under an immunity statute, the Court stated (at 27), "Of course all oral testimony by individuals can properly be compelled only by exchange of immunity for waiver of the privilege." (Emphasis in the original.)

The registration provisions of the Act do not require the production of the records of the organization. On the contrary, they require the officers to prepare and file original statements. The majority below saw no distinction between the two requirements, stating (R. 2094) that the statements "are reproductions of or extracts from organization records" and therefore "'auxiliary to the production'" of the records themselves. Obviously, however, the statements are not "auxiliary" to the production of the records, since the Act does not require the records to be produced. Moreover, it makes no difference whether or not the statements are extracted from the organization's records. In either case, they are statements of the character which, the court stated in the Wilson and White cases, could not be compelled from the officers of a corporation or unincorporated association. Finally, since the registration statement must be filed before the record-keeping requirement of the Act becomes operative, it is not necessarily true that the statement is a "reproduction or extract from" records.[40]

[39] In Wilson, the Court said (at 377), "There is no question, of course of oral testimony, for he [the defendant] was not required to give any." In White, the Court pointed out (at 701) that compelling production of the records of the organization would not infringe the Fifth Amendment's "historic function of protecting only the natural individual from compulsory incrimination through his own testimony or personal records."

The holding below that the privilege does not extend to statements prepared from records is contrary to the Second Circuit's decision in United States v. Daisart Sportswear Inc., 169 F. 2d 856, rev'd on other grounds, Smith v. United States, 337 U. S. 137. There the court said (at 862):

> "The further point is made that Smith, in effect, but summed up what the books of the corporation contained. Coupled with this is the contention that an individual may be compelled to give oral testimony that is explanatory of its records . . . We think, though, the production of records must be distinguished from oral testimony as to what the records would contain, had they been produced."[41]

The rule of White, Wilson, and Shapiro is inapplicable for another reason. In those cases the privilege was invoked on the ground that the contents of the records would incriminate the witness. Here it is not the contents of the records which are incriminating, but the connection with the organization of the person making the statement. As [40] "The execution of a registration statement by an individual would at least require him to confirm and transpose selected material from the organization's records to the registration statement. Since an organization need not keep complete records prior to registration, in many cases the officer would be forced to execute the registration statement by relying on his own knowledge. It is clear that in both instances the officer is doing more than producing records and identifying them. He is disclosing other matters of his personal knowledge." Note, The Infernal Security Act of 1950, 51 Col. L. Rev. 606, 621, quoted in Judge Bazelon's dissent (R. 2160).

[41] Even if all that the Act compelled was the production of records of the organization, the holdings of Wilson, White and Shapiro should not be extended to a case such as this, where the records are those of a political organization active in the area protected by the First Amendment. For the privilege against self-incrimination was primarily designed as a protection for political freedom and the right of dissent. Griswold, The Fifth Amendment Today (1955), p. 8.

the dissent below pointed out (R. 2159), the privilege here arises from the fact that registration compels those who sign the registration statement thereby to identify themselves as members and officers of the Communist Party and as persons who are familiar with its records and have intimate knowledge of its workings. These are precisely the admissions which Blau holds cannot be compelled.

2. The majority below further held (R. 2159) that the adjudication of the question of privilege is premature in this proceeding and must await a criminal prosecution for the failure of the officers to file a registration statement. The majority assigned three grounds for this conclusion.

(a) Citing the familiar principle that the privilege is lost if not asserted, the majority held that the question presented may never arise since the officers may not claim the protection of the Fifth Amendment (R. 2096-2097).

The principle relied on is inapplicable however. For the Act gives the officers no opportunity to claim the privilege and provides no tribunal before which they can make the claim. Under the Act, the officers must file the registration statement within thirty days after a registration order becomes final. Their failure to do so results in their indictment under section 15. Nothing but a time lapse intervenes between failure to file and indictment. Obviously, if there is no opportunity to assert the privilege, it cannot be lost for non-assertion. Since the privilege is a protection against prosecution, as well as against conviction, it must be available before prosecution. Under the Act it is not available, unless in this proceeding.

It cannot be suggested that the officers must create the opportunity to claim the privilege by notifying the Attorney General that they will not file the registration statement because to do so might incriminate them. This notification would be an admission to the chief prosecutor that the individuals are officers of petitioner. Such an admission is itself incriminating. Hence to require the officers to assert the privilege in this manner would be the equivalent of requiring them to incriminate themselves by filing the registration statement.[42]

The doctrine that the privilege must be asserted in order to be relied upon is, accordingly, inapplicable here. The function of the doctrine is to put the tribunal on notice that in the particular instance a particular witness may be entitled to the protection of the privilege, and to allow the tribunal to rule on the subject. Vajtauer v. Commissioner, 273 U. S. 103, 113. No such function can be served in this case, where it appears from the face of the statute that the act of filing the registration statement is itself necessarily incriminating. The situation of the officers of an organization ordered to register is like that of a defendant in a criminal case. Like him, they cannot be compelled to "take the stand" and claim their privilege in order to enjoy it.

If the conclusion reached by the majority were sound, it would follow, as the court itself recognized (R. 2100), that legislation which on its face compels incriminating testimony could never be declared unconstitutional, but could only be held to be unenforceable in particular cases where the privilege was asserted. This is clearly not the law. The Court has held a statute "unconstitutional and void" because it was apparent from its face that it compelled the production of incriminating evidence. Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 638.[43] And state courts have invalidated state statutes similarly compelling self-incrimi-

[42] To require an officer so to notify the Attorney General would also require him to invite prosecution under section 15 of the Act for not registering.

[43] The majority below attempted to distinguish the Boyd case (R. 2100-01) on the grounds that the compelled evidence (1) consisted of "personal, private papers," and (2) was "directly for use in a forfeiture case under a criminal statute." These distinctions are unsound. As we have already shown, the privilege applies to statements as to the content of organizational records just as it does to personal papers. And it applies to leads to incriminating information as well as to evidence which is "directly" incriminating.

nation,[44] including two which required Communist Party members to register.[45]

(b) The majority below suggested (R. 2099) that petitioner's officers may not be entitled to the privilege because some of them were convicted of conspiring to violate the Smith Act, some have publicly asserted their membership, and two identified themselves as officers in testifying before the Board. This suggestion is based on the unwarranted assumption that the persons referred to by the court will be petitioner's officers at the time registration is required. Even if they are, it is obvious that none of the factors alluded to by the court will strip them of their privilege. The conviction of some under the Smith Act is no bar to other indictments for subsequent or different offenses under the same statute[46], or under section 4(a) of the Act, or the other criminal statutes referred to above. The facts that some of the officers have made extra-judicial admissions and that two of them testified about their offices before the Board do not constitute waivers of the privilege with respect to the registration statement. For it is settled that admissions made extra-judicially, in another proceeding, or even at different stages of the same proceeding, do not waive the privilege. Re Neff, 206 F. 2d 149, and cases cited therein at 152; United States v. Field, 193 F. 2d 109; 8 Wigmore on Evidence (3rd Ed.) sec. 2276(4). In any event the suggestion that some of the officers may have waived the privilege obviously cannot apply to other officers as to whom no waiver is claimed.

[46] In fact, all of the eleven defendants convicted in Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, are also under pending indictments for violating the membership provisions of the Smith Act, 18 U.S.C. 2385.

(c) Finally, the majority below suggested (R. 2099-2100) the possibility that the Attorney General might meet the officers' claim of privilege by invoking the procedure under the new immunity statute, 18 U. S. C. 3486. That statute, however, has no application to the filing of registration statements under the Act. It applies only to the giving of testimony and the production of documents before Congressional committees, federal grand juries, and federal courts.

It is clear from the foregoing that the privilege against self-incrimination is available to petitioner's officers and that the question of the constitutionality of the Act under the Fifth Amendment is ripe for decision at this time. The circumstances which give petitioner standing to assert the denial of due process to its members (see supra, p. 72) likewise support its standing to challenge the Act's violation of the constitutional privilege.

Coerced self-incrimination so pervades and infects the entire scheme of the Act that, as the dissenting judge below held, its invalidity on that ground can and should be adjudicated in this proceeding.

IX. The Act Violates the First Amendment.

The Act, as we have now seen, is saturated with gross violations of the elementary rules of fair procedure. These odious features—predetermination of guilt, irrational presumptions, a biased administrative tribunal, guilt by association, coercion of confessions—were designed for the one purpose of suppressing political dissent. Indeed, once the legislature embarked on so far-reaching a project to outlaw political non-conformity, it was inevitable that this police-state objective would be reached by police state procedures. The most fundamental vice of the Act, therefore, is its attempted destruction of the freedoms secured by the First Amendment.

In terms of the legal framework set by the precedents, this unprecedented Act involves three types of violations of the First Amendment. (1) It suppresses peaceable advocacy and assembly. (2) It imposes prior restraints on protected expression. (3) It imposes sanctions for the exercise of rights guaranteed by the First Amendment.

A. The Act Suppresses Peaceable Advocacy and Assembly.

Statutes affecting speech, press and assembly must be narrowly drawn to meet a substantive evil which the legislature has power to control. A statute penalizing conduct which lies outside the area protected by the First Amendment is invalid if it is so broad that it likewise abridges protected expression or assembly. United States v. C. I. O., 335 U. S. 106; Schneider v. Irvington, 308 U. S. 147; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 308; Jones v. Opelika, 316 U. S. 584, 618 (dissenting opinion, adopted by the Court in Jones v. Opelika, 319 U. S. 103); Saia v. New York, 334 U. S. 558; Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507; Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359; DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353; Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495.

The Act as a whole violates this principle, as does each of its major sanctions individually.

1. The Act as a Whole.

The justification of the Act, stated in section 2, is the alleged seditious and criminal activity of Communist-action organizations. But the Act's controls are not limited to the regulation or exposure of this or any other misconduct.[47] Instead, as we have shown (supra, pp. 28-33), the [47] We have seen also that both the Board and the court below acknowledged that proof of seditious and criminal activity is not a prerequisite to the entry of a registration order (supra, p. 46).

Act and the order suppress all of petitioner's activities, including its admittedly extensive peaceable advocacy and assembly.

Whatever else may be asserted, petitioner concededly engages in peaceable political advocacy. Although always numerically small, it has run numerous candidates for public office, some of whom were elected, has participated in coalitions to elect non-Communist candidates, and has engaged in other political and economic activity within the tradition of American working class and socialist parties which preceded it. Even its worst enemies admit that it has frequently played a seminal role in bringing about needed changes in our social and economic life.[48] Many of the reforms advanced by petitioner and originally the object of vilification, have been adopted by the people of the United States, when they were convinced, with the aid of Communist agitation, that these were to their best interest. To name only a few: social security, minimum wage legislation, the organization of labor unions on industrial lines, and measures against racial discrimination. Like other political parties it seeks to help organize "the expression of bloc sentiment" which "is and always has been an integral part of our democratic and electoral process." United States v. C. I. O., supra, at 143.

It is precisely this peaceable conduct which the Act is designed to reach. Other laws provide a plethora of sanctions for acts or advocacy of a seditious character and require the registration of foreign agents (see supra, p. 34, ftn. 8). The Act, however, proscribes the organization as a whole and with it all its advocacy, including lawful political expression, association and activity.

This dragnet approach of the Act is not permitted in the area of speech and assembly. Congress can outlaw acts which threaten the nation's security. Under Dennis v.

[48] See, e.g., Tr. 3039-40, 14342-45.

United States, 341 U. S. 494, it can, in clear and present danger circumstances, prohibit advocacy of force and violence. But it cannot, in the guise of preventing such acts and advocacy, suppress peaceable political advocacy. Since the Act suppresses all advocacy and political activity of the Communist Party, and is not limited to (and is unnecessary for) suppressing illegitimate and dangerous conduct, it is invalid.

At the heart of the First Amendment furthermore, is the principle that government may not intervene in the political process by imposing special disabilities on any political group. Otherwise the party in power could perpetuate itself in office by denying its rivals free and equal access to the electorate. The Act clearly infringes this principle. For it discriminatorily prevents petitioner from engaging in political activities of a kind employed by other political parties and groups in their effort to attract the adherence of the public. As the President said of the Act in his special message, while it was pending in Congress, (supra, p. 6) it "would, in effect, impose severe penalties for normal political activities on the part of certain groups, including Communists and Communist Party-line followers," and it attempts to "proscribe for groups such as the Communists, certain activities that are perfectly proper for everyone else." In so doing, the Act not only deprives petitioner of its First Amendment rights, but also denies to the entire American people access to all varieties of political opinion and the right freely to make their own selections in the market-place of ideas.

These constitutional principles which the Act violates have been applied by the Court specifically to the Communist Party and its members. In DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353, and Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242, the Court held that peaceable assembly and advocacy of the Communist Party and its members could not be abridged even if it were assumed that the Party engaged in illicit advocacy and activity.

The invalidity of the Act was foreshadowed in American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382. Although that decision sustained the non-Communist affidavit requirement of the Taft-Hartley Act, it did so only on the premise that the requirement did not substantially infringe the rights of individuals to belong to the Communist Party and the rights of the Party and its members to engage in peaceable advocacy.

Douds recognized (at 402) that a tax on the exercise of First Amendment freedoms would be invalid as a direct restraint comparable to imprisonment, fines, and injunctions. The Act's inhibitions on membership in petitioner and on its advocacy are far more onerous than a tax.

Douds stated (ibid.) that a requirement that adherents of particular political parties wear identifying armbands would "obviously" be invalid. Armbands are obnoxious because they identify the wearer as a member of a proscribed group and expose him to infamy. The registration and labelling requirements of the present Act fulfill exactly this function. They differ from an arm-band requirement only in technical detail.

The Act is condemned by Douds because it is "frankly aimed at the suppression of dangerous ideas" (ibid.). It involves "the elements of censorship" and "prohibition of the dissemination of information" (at 403). This legislation and the Board's order "restrain the activities of the Communist Party as a political organization" and "attempt to stifle beliefs" (at 404). The "discouragements" of the Act proceed "against the groups or beliefs identified" rather than against "the combination of those affiliations or beliefs with occupancy of a position of great power over the economy of the country" (at 403-404). The Act and registration order do not touch "only a relative handful of persons," and they do not leave "the great majority of persons of the identified affiliations and beliefs completely free from restraint" (at 404). On the contrary, every member of petitioner is restrained by a variety of sanctions.[49] Those who are affected by the statute are subject not merely to "possible loss of positions" in trade unions (ibid.), but are coerced to abandon their political beliefs and affiliations by penalties which would brand them as criminals, subject them to public odium and vigilantism, and deprive them of their livelihood, citizenship, and right to travel.

Turning to Mr. Justice Jackson's opinion in Douds, we note (see at 434) that the impact of the Act and the Board's order are "to suppress or outlaw the Communist Party" and to prohibit it and its members from engaging in "above-board activity normal in party struggles." If this order is sustained, the petitioner may not continue to engage in political activities "just as other parties may." The Act and the order operate to prohibit an individual from becoming or remaining a "full-fledged member of the Party." They impose requirements and prohibitions on a person "merely because he is a member of, or is affiliated with, the Communist Party," and they apply to all members, not merely to those who are labor union officials.

Douds held that the impact of section 9(h) of the Taft-Hartley Act and the effect of its sanction upon the activities of Communist Party members were narrowly limited to the prevention of what Congress found to be a substantive injury to interstate commerce. Its approval of what was considered only an incidental infringement of civil rights rested on the view that Congress had acted economically to attain a constitutionally permitted objective.

In sharp contrast, the Act suppresses all the advocacy of petitioner and its members. The Act's invasion of the civil rights of Communists is not incidental to some other and legitimate legislative objective. It is an end in itself, its only other purpose being to use the denial of civil rights to Communists as a foundation for the abridgment of the constitutional liberties of non-Communists.

[49] By virtue of section 5 of the Communist Control Act, these sanctions also restrain persons who are not members of petitioner within any legitimate meaning of the term.

The Court upheld the statute in Douds because it considered that the Congress had acted with restraint. But in this Act Congress went beserk.

The legislative finding of section 2 that "the Communist organization in the United States . . . presents a clear and present danger" cannot rescue the Act.

In the first place, determination of this issue of constitutional fact is not within the province of the legislature, but is reserved to the courts. Dennis v. United States, supra, at 513. Clearly the First Amendment prohibits Congress from invading the prerogative of the electorate so as to proscribe political groups by the simple expedient of finding that they constitute clear and present dangers.

The existence of a clear and present danger must necessarily be a question for judicial rather than legislative determination because it concerns the constitutional application of a statute, not its inherent validity. The issues under the clear and present danger exception are whether the content of the expression and the circumstances under which it is disseminated give rise to the danger of a substantive evil that Congress has the power to prevent. Obviously these issues cannot be predetermined in advance by the legislature at the time it enacts a statute but must be decided by the courts, case by case, in the light of the nature of the particular expression and the circumstances of its utterance. In the Act, however, Congress declared that a Communist-action organization constitutes a clear and present danger for all future time without regard to the content of its advocacy or the conditions prevailing at the time the advocacy is engaged in. But a future or permanent clear and present danger is a contradiction in terms, and the effort to create one by legislation is patently invalid.

Secondly, an exception to the application of the First Amendment cannot be justified by a finding—even if made by the Court—that an organization whose activity includes peaceable advocacy is a clear and present danger. The clear and present danger exception has been and must necessarily be confined to particular conduct or advocacy which is found to be within the exception. Danger to the state can always be effectively dealt with by prohibiting such conduct. Suppression of the organization as a whole can have no foundation in necessity and thus wantonly abridges peaceable advocacy and association. This is precisely the significance of DeJonge v. Oregon and Herndon v. Lowry, supra, and the admonition in Douds, made without any qualification as to clear and present danger, that Congress may not outlaw the Communist Party, prohibit its peaceable political activity, or penalize membership in it.

In Australian Communist Party v. The Commonwealth, 83 C. L. R. 1 (1951), the High Court of Australia invalidated the Dissolution of the Communist Party Act. Although the case arose in a different constitutional setting, its principles are pertinent here. The statute in question dissolved the Communist Party, authorized the executive to dissolve other organizations found to be under Communist influence or control, and imposed civil disabilities on Communist Party members. It contained a recital of parliamentary findings with reference to Communism in substantially the terms employed by section 2 of the Act. The Commonwealth urged that the law was authorized under the defense power vested in the federal government by the Australian constitution. The High Court answered this argument, in the words of one of the prevailing opinions, as follows (at 225-227):

> "Any conduct which is reasonably capable of delaying or otherwise being prejudicial to the Commonwealth preparing for war would be conduct which could be prevented or prohibited or regulated under the defense power. Amongst such conduct there could be included, I should think, most if not all, of the serious misdoings with which communist bodies and communists are charged in the recitals. But the legislation would have to define the nature of the conduct and the means adopted to combat it, so that the court would be in a position to judge whether it was reasonably necessary to legislate with respect to such conduct in the interests of defense and whether such means were reasonably appropriate to the purpose . . . But none of this conduct is prevented or prohibited or made an offense by the operative provisions of the Act . . . In my opinion legislation to wind up bodies corporate or unincorporate and to dispose of their assets or to deprive individuals of their civil rights or liberties on the mere assertion of Parliament or the Executive that they are conducting themselves in a manner prejudicial to security and defense, is not authorized by the defense power or the incidental power in peace time."

And as another one of the Justices put it (at 187-188):

"In point of constitutional theory the power to legislate for the protection of an existing form of government ought not to be based upon a conception, if otherwise adequate, adequate only to assist those holding power to resist or suppress obstruction or opposition or attempts to displace them or the forms of government they defend."

The High Court's decision demonstrates a sound awareness of a minimum requirement for the preservation of a free society in the face of spurious appeals to "internal security." Its principles must be applied here if Americans are to be as free as Australians.

The court below stated that for the purpose of passing on the constitutionality of the Act, it was required to assume that the conditions with which the Act purports to deal "actually exist," and that these conditions, as recited in section 2, are that, "There exists a world Communist movement . . . whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world . . ." (R. 2085). The court concluded that the Government "has power to prohibit within its borders activity of the sort described; a fortiori it has power to require identification of such activities and to impose restrictions short of proscription" (R. 2087).

Undoubtedly, Congress has the power to punish, control or expose espionage, sabotage, terrorism and other criminal "activity of the sort described" in section 2. But that premise does not support the constitutionality of the Act. In the first place, as the court below acknowledged (see supra, p. 46), the sanctions of the Act may be imposed upon an organization without proof that it engages in any "activity of the sort described." Secondly, as we have seen, the sanctions of the Act are not limited to the identification or control of "activity of the sort described" and are unnecessary for that purpose. Their real impact is upon activity of a completely different sort—peaceable political advocacy and association.

The court's failure to appreciate these two points invalidates all of its First Amendment discussion. Thus the court does not deny that a registration order is an edict of outlawry. It states, however (R. 2016):

> ". . . If an organization is actually operating primarily to achieve the objectives of a foreign organization dedicated to the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship in this country by other than constitutional processes, we perceive no constitutional obstacle to its outlawry." (Emphasis supplied.)

This statement is inapplicable to the Act in the light of the court's acknowledgement that proof of the use of advocacy of "other than constitutional processes" is not a prerequisite to the issuance of a registration order of outlawry. Moreover, the statement is erroneous. The facts assumed by the court would, at most, justify restraints on the use or advocacy of "other than constitutional processes." They could not justify the abridgement of peaceable advocacy and assembly.

Again, the court below stated (R. 2088):

> "The activities of a world Communist movement such as that described in this statute and of organizations in this country devoted to its objectives constitute a clear and present danger within the meaning of any definition of the point at which freedom of speech gives way to the requirements of government security."

This statement repeats both of the errors we have already discussed. It overlooks the facts that the Act does not require proof of "dangerous" activities and that it suppresses peaceable advocacy and assembly.

Furthermore, the court's reliance on the clear and present danger exception is faulty for the reasons we have earlier stated (supra, pp. 96-97). Accordingly, the court's reference to the Dennis case (R. 2089-90) is misplaced. Dennis decided only that a conspiracy to advocate the violent overthrow of the government under conditions prevailing in the summer of 1948 constituted a clear and present danger. Here no such conspiracy or advocacy was found, and the registration order proscribes all of the petitioner's advocacy forever, regardless of prevailing conditions.

2. The Sanctions of the Act Considered Individually.

In passing upon the constitutionality of the Act the individual sanctions cannot be abstracted from their setting in the statutory scheme whose purpose and effect is to outlaw petitioner. But even if the major sanctions of the Act are examined separately, it is clear that each of them violates the First Amendment.

The court below held that the individual sanctions were valid on the ground that "each sanction is reasonably related to the substantive evil at which Congress was aiming" (R. 2109). But this is not the test for determining whether the First Amendment is infringed. In the area of speech, press and assembly, "The rational connection between the remedy provided and the evil to be curbed, which in other contexts might support legislation against attack on due process grounds, will not suffice." Restrictions on First Amendment rights "must be justified by clear public interest, threatened not doubtfully or remotely, but by clear and present danger." Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, 530.

Each of the major sanctions of the Act violates this First Amendment test. Moreover, the court below notwithstanding, each also violates the due process test.

(a) Section 5 makes membership in an organization finally ordered to register a conclusive bar to all federal employment, including the most non-sensitive. It excludes considerations of scienter, personal innocence, fitness, and the nature of the job in question. Its prohibition rests merely on the fact of association. Even this association need not be with a group that engages in illegal conduct, for, as the court below held, the Act does not require proof of such conduct. The Act thus goes far beyond the much-criticized loyalty-security program established by executive orders. Under that program, organizational membership is not a conclusive disqualification, but "is simply one piece of evidence which may or may not be helpful in arriving at a conclusion as to the action which is to be taken in a particular case." 5 C. F. R. App. A, p. 200; quoted in Joint Anti Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, supra, at 205. See also Kutcher v. Gray, 91 App. D. C. 266, 199 F. 2d 783.

Clearly, the government employment sanction of the Act has no reasonable relation to protection of the federal service, is without foundation in the public interest, and is not addressed to a clear and present danger. The Adler case, supra, though relied on by the court below, itself establishes that the sanction is invalid because it creates a conclusive disqualification on the basis of association alone.

(b) The sanction of section 5 with respect to employment in "defense facilities" has all the defects of the sanction against governmental employment. Yet it cannot even be defended on the basis that the government has a special interest in and power over its own employees. In addition, the sanction is invalid because the Act delegates unfettered and unreviewable authority to the Secretary of Defense to designate any private enterprise as a "defense facility," and thus by ukase to deny members of Communist-action organizations any employment, including the most non-sensitive. This fact alone demonstrates the unsoundness of the justification advanced for this sanction by the court below—that it involves "sensitive business" (R. 2111). Moreover, the sanction applies to non-sensitive jobs in sensitive businesses.

(c) Section 5(a)(2), which makes it unlawful for employee of the government or of "defense facilities" to contribute to a Communist organization, is a plain violation of the principle of economy demanded by the First Amendment. The prohibition is imposed without regard to the purpose of the contribution and the use made of it, both of which may be entirely innocent and even praiseworthy. Clearly, Congress cannot make it an offense to contribute to the promotion of good causes through the device of characterizing the promoter as "bad." Furthermore, under the definition of "contribution" (sec. 3(6)), the section makes it criminal for federal and defense facility employees to subscribe to any publication of a proscribed organization, regardless of the publication's nature and content. Clearly this is a crass violation of freedom of the press.

(d) The sanction against trade-union employment[50] is another blatant example of the unconstitutional blunderbuss technique of the Act. Douds sustained section 9(h) of the Taft-Hartley Act as a valid exercise of the commerce power because its "discouragement" did not proceed against the affiliations or beliefs of the officers of trade unions "but only against the combination of those affiliations and beliefs with occupancy of a position of great power over the economy of the country." Section 5(1)(E), however, does not purport to be an exercise of the commerce power, and the impact of its prohibition is not limited to officers and employees of trade unions whose members are engaged in interstate commerce. Nor are the "discouragements" of that section confined to persons who occupy positions of power over the national economy. On the contrary, the reach of section 5(1)(E) extends to every employee of every trade union. Accordingly, a member of a Communist organization finally ordered to register is liable to a five-year prison term and a $10,000 fine for the "crime" of holding a job as a janitor for a local of the Musicians Union (secs. 5(1)(E) and 15(b)).

(e) Section 6 makes it unlawful for members of Communist organizations finally ordered to register to apply for or use passports. Since it is now a criminal offense to travel outside of the Western Hemisphere without a passport,[51] the section prohibits foreign travel elsewhere by members of Communist organizations. Congress may, of course, make it a crime to travel abroad for the purpose of promoting or consummating activity of a criminal character. But the prevention of criminal activity may not be used as the pretext for prohibiting foreign travel for entirely legitimate purposes.[52] Yet this is what Congress did in section 6, which is based on the invalid premise that foreign travel for any purpose by members of Communist organizations is inherently evil and may be prohibited.

The court below sustained section 6 on the ground that the government may reasonably decline to confer its diplomatic protection on members of Communist organizations (R. 2011-12). But this ground cannot sustain what the government has done by section 6 in the context of other legislation. Since the government has itself made it illegal to travel abroad without a passport, it must justify denials of passports as denials of the right to travel, and not merely as denials of governmental protection. Section 6 cannot be so justified in view of its sweep. Indeed, the reasoning of the court below has been repudiated by the same circuit in the later decision of Schachtman v. Dulles, No. 12406, decided June 23, 1955, not yet reported.

(f) Section 25 of the Act (carried forward in section 340(c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act) makes membership by a naturalized citizen, within five years after naturalization, in an organization ordered to register under the Act, prima facie evidence sufficient to authorize the revocation of his citizenship in a denaturalization proceeding. This violates the First Amendment, which prohibits revocation of citizenship for mere association. Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118; Knauer v. United States, 328 U. S. 654, 669; Baumgartner v. United States, 322 U. S. 665. These cases involved association at the time of naturalization. The Act presents an aggravated case, since it presumes fraudulent procurement of naturalization on the basis of association after naturalization.

[52] Similarly, a postal fraud order may make communications relating to a fraudulent scheme non-mailable. But it may not close the mails to innocent communications of the offender. See Donaldson v. Read Magazine, 333 U. S. 178, 191-92.

The court below (R. 2114-15) avoided a decision on the validity of the denaturalization sanction on the ground that the issue must await determination in a denaturalization proceeding under the section. However, the presence of this section in the Act causes immediate harm to petitioner by making membership in it prohibitive for naturalized citizens. The issue is therefore ripe for adjudication, and petitioner has standing in this proceeding to challenge the validity of the section on its face (see supra, p. 72).

(g) Section 10 requires an organization ordered to register to label all its mail and broadcasts as emanating from a Communist organization and hence as the product of a group that has been officially condemned as a seditious foreign agent. Obviously these requirements effectively restrain freedom of press and expression. They cannot be justified as protective measures or as safeguards against danger since they apply regardless of content.

The court below analogized section 10 to the mail fraud statutes (R. 2112). But the analogy is faulty because the restraints of the latter are based on the content of the mail, not on the character of the sender or recipient.[53] The power to prevent fraudulent communications cannot be employed to restrain those innocent of fraud. Donaldson v. Read Magazine, 333 U. S. 178, 191-92, sustained a post-office fraud order against a First Amendment attack because the order was limited to communications relating to the particular fraudulent scheme, leaving other communications of the offending publication untouched. Similarly, the Postmaster General may not ban future issues of a magazine from the mails because past issues contained obscene matter. Summerfield v. Sunshine Book Company, 221 F. 2d 42, cert. den. 349 U. S. 921. Section 10, however, restrains all future literature and broadcasts of the organization, which are necessarily of unknown content.

[53] The court also cited provisions of the Federal Trade Commission and the Securities and Exchange Acts barring the mails to fraudulent advertisements for merchandise and to offers or sales of unregistered securities (R. 2112). Thus the court again confused the power of Congress to regulate commercial transactions under the due process clause with its power to restrain speech and assembly under the First Amendment (see supra, pp. 100-01; infra, p. 109). Furthermore, these statutes, like the mail fraud statutes, regulate on the basis of content.

The section cannot be analogized to the Congressional power to exclude fraudulent matter from the mails for the additional reason that the power does not and cannot constitutionally apply to matters of opinion. American School of Magnetic Healing v. McAnnulty, 187 U. S. 94; Reilly v. Pinkus, 338 U. S. 269. The present case presents an even stronger claim to First Amendment protection than American School of Magnetic Healing and Reilly, since it involves opinion on political questions.

The court below also defended section 10 by citing the labelling provisions of the Foreign Agents Registration Act (R. 2113). But the controls of that statute, as construed in Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, are limited to activities conducted by the agent on behalf of his foreign principal. Furthermore, the label is not an invidious one. Section 10 of the Act, however, requires communications to be labelled as emanating from a seditious foreign agent even though they are made in the organization's own behalf and are innocent of seditious content.

The court below also compared section 10 to statutes requiring that paid broadcasts be identified by the name of the purchaser and that literature on behalf of candidates for federal office bear the name of the issuer (R. 2111-12). These provisions, however, are non-invidious and non-discriminatory, and hence do not "discourage" the exercise of First Amendment rights. The failure of the court below to appreciate the difference between such requirements and the provisions of section 10 is indicated by its statement (ibid.) that petitioner has little to choose between identifying itself as "the Communist Party" and as "a Communist organization." Of course petitioner does not object to identifying itself by name, which it does voluntarily in the conduct of its activities as well as pursuant to statutes of the kind referred to by the Court. This is entirely different, however, from the discriminatory requirement of section 10 that it identify itself with an invidious label or "arm-band" signifying that it has been governmentally condemned as a seditious conspirator and foreign agent. The fact is that section 10 does not identify petitioner, but deprives it of an audience and denies others access to its ideas.

As the foregoing analysis shows, none of the sanctions under discussion is designed to control criminal or seditious conduct or is addressed to any other legitimate governmental objective. Even when each is considered individually, it flagrantly abridges liberties protected by the First Amendment. In the context of the entire Act, the sanctions confirm our contention that the Act outlaws or destroys organizations ordered to register and ruins their members.

B. The Act Imposes a Prior Restraint on the Exercise of First Amendment Rights.

The Act and the order require petitioner to register as a participant in the international criminal conspiracy alleged in section 2 before it can lawfully engage in political advocacy or exercise any other right secured by the First Amendment. The registration statement must detail information on finances and members and must list all printing presses, mimeograph machines, etc., in the possession of the organization, its officers and members, and groups in which it "has an interest."

As we have already shown (supra, pp. 28-33), the registration requirement is an integral part of the invalid statutory scheme to outlaw petitioner. But even if the registration provision is divorced from the remainder of the Act, it is unconstitutional as a prior restraint on the exercise of First Amendment rights.

Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, establishes that the exercise of speech and assembly may not be conditioned on prior registration with governmental authorities. There the Court stated (at 539):

> "If the exercise of the rights of free speech and free assembly cannot be made a crime, we do not think this can be accomplished by the device of requiring previous registration as a condition for exercising them and making such a condition the foundation for restraining in advance their exercise and for imposing a penalty for violating such a restraining order."

The prior restraint invalidated by Thomas v. Collins was far less onerous than that imposed by the Act. The statute there involved merely required registration of the name and trade union affiliation of labor organizers who wished to solicit union membership. The registration did not, as here, involve an opprobrious characterization, nor did it require the identification of the union's members for subjection to intolerable sanctions.

The court below stated (R. 2090) that "the protection which surrounds speech, does not encompass action." In support of that obvious proposition, it quoted from Thomas v. Collins (at 540) to the effect that when a speaker does more than exercise First Amendment rights, "as when he undertakes the collection of funds or securing subscriptions," a reasonable identification requirement may be imposed. From this statement, the court below concluded (R. 2091):

> "If the mere solicitation of funds for a lawful cause is sufficient conduct to validate the restrictive police power of a state, operation to achieve the objectives of a movement such as this statute describes is conduct sufficient to invoke federal regulatory power."

Thus the court's justification of the registration requirement rested on the ground that the thrust of the Act is not against protected expression and assembly but against conduct to achieve the violent, seditious and criminal objectives set forth in section 2. The distinction is fallacious for three reasons.

First, as the court acknowledged (see supra, p. 46), the Act does not require proof that the organization engages in or advocates violent, seditious or criminal conduct as a prerequisite to the imposition of the previous restraint of a registration order.

Second, even if the Act required such proof, the registration requirement would still be invalid because it does not merely inhibit violent, seditious or criminal conduct or advocacy, but restrains peaceable expression and assembly. (See supra, pp. 91-92.) As Thomas v. Collins itself states (at 540), where expression or assembly within the guarantee of the First Amendment is accompanied by conduct which may validly be restricted, the restriction must be applied "in such a manner as not to intrude upon the rights of free speech and assembly."

Finally, even if registration were required only as a condition to the advocacy of the violent overthrow of the government, it would nevertheless be unconstitutional, as well as grotesque. Dennis held that such advocacy may be punished only if engaged in under circumstances that create a clear and present danger. The logic of that decision necessarily invalidates a prior restraint which effectively abridges such advocacy under any and all circumstances. See Thomas v. Collins, supra, at 530.

The court below analogized the registration provisions of the Act to licenses required of "doctors, lawyers, restaurants and barbers" (R. 2109). The heart of Thomas v. Collins, however, is that speech and assembly cannot be subjected to restrictions which are perfectly valid when employed to regulate business or professions (see at 530, 545).[54]

[54] The failure of the court below to recognize this distinction is also shown by its citation (R. 2091, ftn. 19) of Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U. S. 622, in which a majority of the Court sustained an ordi-

The court also supported the validity of the registration provision by references to the Lobbying and Foreign Agents Registration Acts (R. 2109). This Court, however, sustained the Lobbying Act only after limiting its application to persons who collect or receive contributions for the purpose of influencing, and whose main purpose it is to influence, legislation by direct communication with members of Congress. United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612. As so limited, the Court held the statute valid because (at 625, emphasis added):

> "It has merely provided for a modicum of information from those who for hire attempt to influence legislation or who collect or spend funds for that purpose. It only wants to know who is being hired, who is putting up the money, and how much."

The statute thus construed is within the principle recognized in the Thomas case that a reasonable identification or registration requirement may be imposed on one who solicits funds. Furthermore, as Harriss plainly indicates, a registration requirement even under these circumstances would be of doubtful validity if it demanded the registration of persons who seek to influence legislation by means other than direct communication with members of Congress. Cf. United States v. Rumely, 345 U. S. 41. The Act has neither of the saving graces of the Lobbying Act. Registration of Communist organizations is not made dependent on the collection of funds and is a precondition to every form of speech, writing and assembly, irrespective of purpose and without regard to the class of persons sought to be influenced.

This Court has never passed upon the constitutionality of the Foreign Agents Registration Act, 22 U.S.C. 601-620 which, in at least some of its applications, is a regulation

nance regulating house-to-house solicitation of magazine subscriptions on the ground that the "commercial feature" of this activity made it susceptible to regulation.

of commercial or professional relations between foreign agents and their principals. Moreover, it is significant that the one decision of the Court under that act reversed a conviction on the ground that the statute had not been narrowly construed and applied by the trial court. Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, discussed supra, p. 106.

Finally, the registrations under the Lobbying and Foreign Agents Registration Acts require only "a modicum of information" and involve no self-defamation by the registrants.

Passing from the act of registration to the information demanded of registrants, the court below defended the requirement for a financial accounting (sec. 7(d)(3)) on the ground (R. 2110) that this "is no more than is required of any political party, and since petitioner claims to be a political party we see no invalidity in the application to it of such a requirement." Petitioner, of course, is not here attacking the validity of the Corrupt Practices Act (2 U.S.C. 244), with which it, like other political parties, complies. What petitioner does object to is that, under the guise of securing information as to its finances, Congress has discriminatorily singled it out from all other political parties and required it to register as a criminal conspirator as a precondition to its lawful engagement in political advocacy.

The court below found the requirement that petitioner list the names of its members (sec. 7(d)(4)) "similar to the customary requirement in the states that persons participating in the activities of a political party, such as primaries, conventions, etc., register publicly as members" (R. 2110). Obviously, the two requirements have nothing in common. The provisions for registration of party affiliation in connection with primaries are purely voluntary and non-discriminatory, while the Act coerces an identification only of petitioner's members.

A statute which required the Republican and Democratic Parties to make even a non-opprobrious public listing of their members would be clearly invalid as an invasion of the right to privacy of political opinion and affiliation. It is even more necessary to safeguard this right in the case of unpopular minorities, as is revealed by the history of the early Jeffersonians, the abolitionists, and trade unions. Anonymity of membership in unpopular groups, and especially in minority parties, is indispensable to freedom of political action. Almost every minority group which ever advocated substantial social change has been the object of bitter attack and public vituperation. All of them, including every new political party, would have been strangled in infancy if they had been required to reveal the names of their members. To permit this handicap to be imposed on a minority party by a legislature composed of its political opponents is to destroy the electoral process.

The court below ignored the requirement that the registration statement list all printing presses, mimeograph machines and the like in the possession of the registrant, its officers or members, or other groups in which it "has an interest" (sec. 7(d)(6), added by 68 Stat. 586). The premise of this section is that words are inherently dangerous and that instruments for their emission may be registered and regulated like guns. The section has been aptly characterized as "a part-way throwback to concepts of press licensing obsolete in the English-speaking world for centuries." [55]

The same monstrous premise underlies the Act's registration and labelling requirements. Their theory is that all of petitioner's advocacy, regardless of content, can be proscribed because it emanates from an organization governmentally branded as "dangerous."

C. The Act Imposes Sanctions for the Exercise of Rights Guaranteed by the First Amendment.

The evidentiary standards of section 13(e) focus on views and policies and their expression. The first standard relates to the method of formulation and purpose of policies, the second to "non-deviation" of views and policies, the fourth to instruction and training, and the fifth to reporting. The sixth (discipline) and the eighth (allegiance) involve subjective attitudes.

None of the standards, as we have seen, has the remotest relation to the criminal acts attributed to Communist organizations by section 2 of the Act. Indeed, most of the standards have no relation to acts at all, but only to views and expression.

Furthermore, under section 13(e), the content and nature of the views and expression are irrelevant. They need not be dangerous, much less create a clear and present danger. They need not be false or seditious, but may be objectively true and in the interests of the American people. In effect, views and expression form a basis for penalties simply because they are similar to views expressed by spokesmen for the Soviet Union.[56]

The Act thus profoundly infringes the First Amendment by imposing a malignant political censorship. Congress may not restrain the dissemination of ideas because they are considered false. Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, 545; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624. Much less may it restrain ideas without reference to their truth or falsity.

[56] The court below acknowledged (R. 2121) that the "directives and policies" criterion (sec. 13(e)(1)) does not require a showing that petitioner's objectives are evil or morally wrong, much less that they are criminal or violent. It further acknowledged (R. 2122) that the "non deviation" criterion may be satisfied by evidence of policies calculated to secure the peace and welfare of the American people.

Under the outermost limits of Congressional power to restrain speech, staked out in Dennis v. United States, supra, Congress cannot control even the advocacy of violence in the absence of circumstances that create a clear and present danger. Much less, therefore, can it impose penalties for the advocacy of peaceable action, which can never give rise to clear and present danger. Because the registration requirements and other sanctions of the Act are reprisals for peaceful advocacy, they are invalid.

In addition, the sanctions on members of the organization are invalid because they penalize innocent association. The members are denied constitutionally protected rights and privileges merely because of their association, and without regard to their own conduct and personal innocence.

This imputation of guilt for association violates the Constitution. "Guilt with us remains individual and personal, even as respects conspiracies. It is not a matter of mass application." Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U. S. 750, 772. See also Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, 136; Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U. S. 135, 163; Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, supra, at 178-79.

The Court has twice flatly held that a person cannot be penalized for participation in peaceable advocacy of the Communist Party even if it be assumed that the Party also advocates doctrines of force and violence. DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353; Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242. As the Court stated in the DeJonge case (at 365-66):

> "We are not called upon to review the findings of the state court as to the objectives of the Communist Party. Notwithstanding these objectives, the defendant still enjoyed his personal right of free speech and to take part in a peaceable assembly having a lawful purpose, although called by that Party. The defendant was none the less entitled to discuss the public issues of the day and thus in a lawful manner, without incitement to violence or crime, to seek redress of alleged grievances. That was of the essence of his guaranteed personal liberty."

Section 5 of the Communist Control Act carries the vices of the original Act a step further. Under that section, protected expression and association are given one more illegitimate use, this time to identify the persons who are to be victimized as "members" of petitioner. As we have seen (supra, pp. 77-80), an individual's association with officers or members of petitioner may be for the most innocuous of purposes, his spoken and written advocacy may be in behalf of the most praiseworthy of objectives, yet he may lose his livelihood, reputation and liberty because, under the criteria of section 5, these entirely innocent activities are indicia of "membership" in petitioner.

The court below (ignoring section 5 of the Communist Control Act) sustained the Act on the ground (R. 2121):

> "Our government may well oppose the establishment in this country of a totalitarian dictatorship of the sort described in the definition, even if such a dictatorship does not meet the definition of 'evil' or if it has many beneficent features."

This statement is beside the point. Perhaps the government in power may "oppose" the establishment of another form of government in this country. So Republicans may "oppose" Democrats by charging that the New Deal and Fair Deal were attempting to introduce "socialism" into the United States or that "the Democratic Party is the captive of a left wing group in the United States that is part of a world-wide Socialist network."[58a] But it does not follow that the Democratic Party could be outlawed if this charge were true.

The issue tendered in this case is not whether the government may "oppose" social change, but whether it may impose sanctions for the advocacy of change. Certainly, so long at least as the advocates of change confine themselves to peaceful persuasion and the use of democratic processes, the government is limited to countering their advocacy with its own. It may not suppress the advocacy which it "opposes." If the First Amendment means anything, it prohibits Congress from abridging, let alone suppressing, the advocacy of political change by non-violent and constitutional means. Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359, 369.

Mr. Justice Holmes, dissenting in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U. S. 652, 673, applied this principle to advocacy of a proletarian dictatorship:

> "If, in the long run, the beliefs established in proletarian dictatorship are destined to be accepted by the dominant forces of the community, the only meaning of free speech is that they should be given their chance and have their way."

See also Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, 142-144.

The court below itself stated (R. 2116), "Unpopular causes are entitled to the privilege of the arena, but they must sustain the severe burdens of the arena." The privilege of the arena is all that petitioner demands. The unconstitutionality of the Act lies precisely in the fact that it denies petitioner that privilege solely on the ground that its cause is presently unpopular and that many of its views are similar to those held by Communists of other lands.

The rationale of the opinion below is not advanced by the statement (R. 2091):

> "Clearly the aim of the statute before us is at action and conduct rather than at mere speech and assembly. A purpose to establish a proletarian dictatorship, posited in paragraph (1) of Section 2 of the Act, is itself a program of action rather than mere discussion."

The purpose of all political expression and association is to persuade people to act. Thomas v. Collins, supra, at 537; Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U. S. 1, 4. It is of the essence of the First Amendment, therefore, that advocacy of action is protected so long, at least, as the action advocated is peaceable. The court below further stated (ibid.), that "the terms used in paragraph (1) of Section 2 to describe the means adopted by the world Communist movement—infiltration into other groups, espionage, sabotage, terrorism—are terms of action." It is true that the advocacy of violent and criminal action of the character described, when engaged in under clear and present danger circumstances, can be penalized. But that fact cannot rescue the Act, since it does not require a showing either of such advocacy or of such a danger, and since the Act's inhibitions extend to peaceable advocacy.

"Heresy trials are foreign to our Constitution." United States v. Ballard, 322 U. S. 78, 86. Yet the Act outdoes the heresy trials which were banned by the First Amendment. Heretics were burned for promulgating or believing in doctrine supposed to be false and wicked. The Act, however, punishes political heretics for promulgating doctrine that may be true and good. It condemns all views, true or false, good or bad, merely because they resemble those of the Soviet Union. Thus it creates the strangest and most virulent of all heresies—"non-deviation," including "non-deviation" from the truth. In this respect the Act vividly demonstrates the accuracy of a recent letter of the General Council of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., addressed to Presbyterians (N. Y. Times, Nov. 3, 1953):

> "The state of strife known as the 'cold war,' in which our own and other nations, as well as groups within nations, are now engaged, is producing startling phenomena and sinister personalities. In this form of warfare, falsehood is frequently preferred to fact if it can be shown to have greater propaganda value. In the interest of propaganda, the truth is deliberately distorted or remains unspoken. . . . According to the > new philosophy, if what is true 'gives aid and comfort' to our enemies, it must be suppressed. Truth is thus a captive in the land of the free."

If the Act is sustained, there remain no effective limitations on Congress' control over political expression and association. If Congress can punish "nondeviation" from Soviet views, it can penalize "non-deviation" from other views. In fact, the provisions of the Act relating to front and infiltrated organizations, as well as section 5 of the Communist Control Act, already penalize "non-deviation" from views advanced or supported by petitioner.[57] And it is a commonplace today to label as "Communist views" whatever is distasteful to the speaker. Indeed, some of our most distinguished public figures have been accused by their political enemies of being under Communist influence,[58] following Communist policies, aiding Communist [57] The first petition filed under the Act by the Attorney General against a trade union alleges that it is Communist-infiltrated on the grounds, among others, that it has promoted the objectives of the Communist Party by advocating the following views: "The Union has opposed legislation enacted for the control and punishment of subversive activities, such as the Smith Act, the Foreign Agents Registration Act, the Taft-Hartley Act and the Communist Control Act; opposed the Selective Service Act, the draft extension act and the Defense Production Act; denounced Congressional Committees and other government bodies for investigating un-American and subversive activities; denounced government law-enforcement agencies, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Immigration and Naturalization Service and opposed the registration and deportation of aliens; opposed the Federal employee loyalty program; supported and urged its members to support the Progressive Party; advocated clemency for Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, the "Trenton Six", Willie McGee and the "Martinsville Seven"; charged the United States government with the practice of genocide; and denounced American statesmen and industrialists as "warmongers." objectives, and even of abetting treason. As Robert Maynard Hutchins has stated:

> "It is now fashionable to call anybody with whom you disagree a Communist or a fellow traveller. So Branch Rickey darkly hinted the other day that the attempt to eliminate the reserve clause in baseball contracts was the work of Communists. One who criticizes the foreign policy of the United States, or the draft, or the Atlantic Pact, or who believes that our military establishment is too expensive can be called a Fellow Traveller, for the Russians are of the same opinion. One who thinks that there are too many slums and too much lynching in America can be called a Fellow Traveller, for the Russians say the same. One who opposes racial discrimination or the Ku Klux Klan can be called a Fellow Traveller, for the Russians claim that they ought to be opposed. Anybody who wants any change of any kind in this country can be called a Fellow Traveller, because the Russians want change in this country, too . . . The miasma of thought control that is now spreading over the country is the greatest menace to the United States since Hitler." degree their connection with and participation in the world-wide Communist conspiracy," and that "the citation of these authorities clearly indicates a dangerous influence and control exerted on the court by Communist-front pressure groups and other enemies of the American Republic."

PART TWO

I. The Order of the Board and the Decision Below Are Based on Erroneous Interpretations of Section 13(e) and on Evidence Having No Rational Relation to the Criteria of that Section or to the Definition of a Communist-Action Organization

A. The Erroneous Interpretation and Application of Section 13(e)

Because relevant evidence was not available to prove that petitioner is a Communist-action organization, the standards of section 13(e) were designed to guarantee the issuance of a registration order against petitioner upon irrelevant evidence which was believed to be available (supra, pp. 46-53). It developed, however, that the Attorney General was unable to produce even the irrelevant evidence which might satisfy section 13(e). For this reason, the Board was compelled to misconstrue the criteria of that section and to rely on evidence which had no rational tendency to prove them or the section 3(3) definition. These errors of the Board, affirmed by the court below, become apparent upon examination of the Board's application of each criterion of section 13(e).

1. The "Directives and Policies" Criterion.

Under section 13(e)(1), the Board is directed to consider the extent to which an organization acts pursuant to Soviet directives or to effectuate Soviet policies. An analysis of the findings of the Board on this issue (R. 29-79), which were affirmed by the court below without discussion (R. 2147-2148), demonstrate that they were based on an irrational interpretation and application of this criterion. In essence, the Board's conclusion that petitioner was currently acting pursuant to Soviet directives and to effectuate Soviet policies was based on the admitted fact that petitioner, like the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and other lands, is an adherent of the theory and practice of Communism, described as "Marxism-Leninism." Thus, while ostensibly applying section 13(e)(1), the Board in fact equated the "directives and policies" criterion with the "non-deviation" criterion of 13(e)(2), as erroneously applied by it (see infra, p. 137). In effect, it found that section 13(e)(1) was satisfied because the petitioner did not currently "deviate" from the principles of Marxism-Leninism as these were interpreted by the Board.

The Board found, as was undisputed, that petitioner was a member of the Communist International prior to November 1940, at which time it terminated its affiliation at a special convention called for that purpose (R. 14). As the Board further found, the Communist International dissolved in 1943 (ibid.).[59] It is undisputed, and was acknowledged by the court below (R. 2142), that petitioner has had no international affiliation since 1940.[60]

The Board found that prior to petitioner's 1940 disaffiliation from the Communist International, decisions and resolutions of that body were "directives" to petitioner with which it complied (R. 10-13).[61] The Report cites no instance subsequent to 1940 in which petitioner received foreign directives within any legitimate meaning of that term. Moreover, petitioner's witnesses, Gates and Miss Flynn, testified without contradiction that during their tenure as members of petitioner's national committee,[62] petitioner received no foreign directives of any kind, but formulated and carried out its policies pursuant to its independent judgment as to the needs and interests of the American people (R. 1211, 1227, 1288-89).

[59] The Report suggests that petitioner's 1940 disaffiliation was spurious (R. 6, 14, 130). The court below did not adopt this suggestion, but found (R. 2141) that "The disaffiliation was an organizational separation." Moreover, the evidence refutes the Board's suggestion (see infra, pp. 202-03), which is irrelevant in any event since it is undisputed that the Communist International dissolved in 1943.

[60] The uncontradicted evidence is, as the court below found, that petitioner was never affiliated with the Communist Information Bureau and has had no dealings or relations with it (R. 65, 1209-10, 1286-89). As the evidence cited in the Report shows, membership in the Bureau is confined to the Communist Parties of eight European countries "for mutual consultation and voluntary coordination of action" (R. 7).

The Board found, nevertheless, that petitioner's continued adherence to Marxist principles subsequent to 1940 established, ipso facto, that it acts pursuant to Soviet directives and to effectuate Soviet policy. This finding rests on absurd premises, and a misconstruction of section 13(e)(1).

Marxism-Leninism Is Not a Series of Directives.

The basic premise of this finding is that "Marxism-Leninism . . . has been promulgated and issued by the Soviet Union as the overall philosophy, authoritative rules, directives and instructions governing the world Communist movement," and that "by the acceptance of and adherence to Marxism-Leninism, [petitioner] subjects itself to the authority of the Soviet Union" (R. 78).

That this conclusion is the primary basis of the Board's order is evidenced by the fact that almost one-half of the Report is devoted to this asserted characteristic of [61] Inasmuch as petitioner had no international affiliation after 1940, it is unnecessary to argue that its voluntary affiliation to the Communist International and voluntary acceptance of the incidents of membership did not subject it to "domination and control" by that organization or by the Soviet Union.

[62] Gates and Miss Flynn had been members of the national committee continuously since 1945 and 1938 respectively (R. 1199, 1275).

Marxism-Leninism (R. 21-79) and by the Board's own statement that "the [Marxist] classics[63] are one of the chief means by which the C.P.S.U. directs, dominates and controls the C.P.U.S.A." (R. 43).

The Board's thesis is absurd on its face, and there is nothing in the record to support this phantasmagoria. As the Board itself acknowledged (R. 22), Marxism-Leninism is a system of thought which sets forth a unified and all-embracing view of man and nature. The writings of Marx, Engels, Lenin, Stalin and others in which this view is expounded and developed cover almost every area of human thought and activity, including economics, philosophy, history, political science, anthropology, natural science, and art (Tr. 15506-09). However one may disagree with the teachings of these books, it must be recognized that they represent a germinal system of thought which has had an enormous impact upon world history and the fields of human knowledge and endeavor with which they deal. They are studied in universities and colleges, and even the most vigorous opponents of their ideas concede that a general knowledge of their contents is indispensable to an understanding of the modern world. Yet the Board perceived in this comprehensive body of thought a set of "directives and instructions," "promulgated and issued" by the Soviet Union.

The Board also ignored the fact that Marxists themselves have always insisted and taught that the principles of scientific socialism are not "instructions," "directives," or blueprints for action. On the contrary, as Marx and Engels stated in their preface to the Manifesto, and as their followers have reiterated, "The practical application of the principles [of Marxism] will depend, as the Manifesto itself states, everywhere and at all times, on the historical conditions for the time being existing . . ." (A. G. Ex. 31, p. 7).[64] Similarly, the authoritative History of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union warns:

> "It may seem that all that is required for mastering the Marxist-Leninist theory is diligently to learn by heart isolated conclusions and propositions from the works of Marx, Engels, and Lenin, learn to quote them at opportune times, and rest at that, in the hope that the conclusions and propositions thus memorized will suit each and every situation and occasion. But such an approach to the Marxist-Leninist theory is altogether wrong . . . Mastering the Marxist-Leninist theory means being able to enrich this theory with the new experience of the revolutionary movement, with new propositions and conclusions, it means being able to develop it and advance it without hesitating to replace —in accordance with the substance of the theory— such of its propositions and conclusions as have become antiquated by new ones corresponding to the new historical situation." (A. G. Ex. 330, pp. 355-56).

Furthermore, the Board made its findings in the face of the fact that all of the works of Marx and Engels and most of those of Lenin to which the Report refers were written long before there was a Soviet Union. According to the Board, the Communist Manifesto, published in 1848, was "promulgated and issued" by the Soviet Union some time after the 1917 revolution as a "directive" by means of which that government "dominates and controls" the Communist Party of the United States in the 1950's.

In reaching this conclusion, the Board perverted history as well as logic. The roots of the Communist Party lie deep in American soil, and Marxist thought, activity and organization were indigenous to this country long before the Russian socialist revolution.

The history of socialism in this country begins with the pre-Marxist Utopian socialists (Robert Owen, Charles Fourier, and Etienne Cabet), who in the first half of the nineteenth century established numerous experimental colonies in the United States (Tr. 15576-77).[65] Marxist socialism appeared in America soon after the publication of the Manifesto. The first Communist Club in the United States was founded in New York City in 1857. Its leading figure, Joseph Weydemeyer, a friend and follower of Marx, later served as a high-ranking officer in the Union army during the Civil War, as did several other Marxists. American Marxists helped in the formation of the Republican Party, backed Lincoln's candidacy in 1860, and actively supported the cause of the North in the Civil War. Marx and Engels themselves wrote for American publications, notably the New York Tribune of Dana and Greeley. Marxists helped form the National Labor Union, the first national federation of American trade unions, whose president, William H. Sylvis, corresponded with Marx and recognized the validity of his views.[66] American Marxists played a leading role in organizing the American Federation of Labor. They founded the Socialist Labor Party in 1876 and the Socialist Party in 1900. (R. 1262-65, 1270-01.)[67]

The absurdity of the Board's conclusion becomes even more patent in the light of its own characterization of Marxism-Leninism. The Report describes it as an "amorphous amalgam" (R. 42). It says that the "rules" for making Marxism-Leninism effective have "been provided an elasticity which makes them applicable under an endless variety of circumstances," and that the "overall policy of Marxism-Leninism" is to do "what is expedient under the given circumstances" (R. 31, 21). It finds that the "tactical aspects of the theory [of Marxism-Leninism] thus attains a flexibility which would appear to make it mean what the current leaders of the C.P.S.U. want it to mean" (R. 23).

[65] Marx once observed, "Socialism and Communism did not originate in Germany, but in England, France and North America." Karl Marx, Selected Essays (N. Y. 1926), p. 140.

[66] Samuel Gompers has described the leading role played by American adherents of the International Workingmen's Association, founded by Marx and Engels, in the early struggles for an eight-hour day in this country. Gompers, Seventy Years of Life and Labor (N. Y. 1925), v. 1, pp. 51-60.

[67] The organization of petitioner grew out of a split in the Socialist Party in 1919 when the left wing majority seceded, primarily over the issue of opposing World War I. Factions within the left wing thereupon organized two separate Communist Parties which merged in 1921 (A.G. Exs. 4, 5, 13).

Petitioner rejects these vulgarizations of Communist theory. But the point here is that the Board's own premise, as expressed in the foregoing excerpts, demolishes its conclusion.

If the body of Marxist-Leninist literature is indeed an "amorphous amalgam," it cannot simultaneously be a series of "directives." Nor can the Soviet Union dominate and control petitioner by directives so "elastic" that they are "applicable under an endless variety of circumstances" and come down to an order to do "what is expedient under the given circumstances."

If Marxist-Leninist theory means nothing but what "the current leaders of the C.P.S.U. want it to mean," then obviously Soviet directives cannot be found in the body of permanent or "classical" literature which, according to the Board, is meaningless in the absence of current, shifting interpretation. The directives, if they exist, must reside in current "interpretative" orders of Soviet leaders. But the record is altogether devoid of current evidence of Soviet orders. In fact, it was precisely the absence of such evidence which forced the Board to fall back on its preposterous notion that Marxism-Leninism is per se a series of directives.

The opinion below did not discuss the Board's thesis that petitioner's adherence to the principles of Marxism-Leninism per se satisfies the directives and policies criterion. However, the court's own conclusion as to the nature of Marxism-Leninism is a further demonstration of the absurdity of that thesis. The court stated (R. 2143):

". . . while the tenets of Marxism-Leninism, forcefully set out in the writings of Marx, Lenin and Stalin, permit a wide flexibility in tactics, that is of intermediate activities and objectives, they admit of no deviation from the ultimate objective, which is a classless, stateless world."

Obviously, a body of doctrine that permits a wide flexibility of intermediate activities and objectives cannot constitute "directives" as to such activities and objectives. The principle that there must be no deviation from the ultimate objective of a classless, stateless world certainly is not a "directive" within the meaning of section 13(e)(1), and still less one from the Soviet Union. Nor can pursuance of that goal supply evidence of an intention to effectuate Soviet policies. The goal of a stateless, classless world has long been advocated by many non-Communists who reject the path taken by the Soviet Union, including contemporary Socialist parties.

Marxism-Leninism Does Not Direct Subservience to the Soviet Union.

Having found that Marxism-Leninism is a series of Soviet directives, the Board proceeded to examine their content. Its findings in this regard, affirmed by the court below without discussion (R. 2147-48), further demonstrate the irrationality of the Board's approach.

The Board found that "a Communist Party which adheres to Marxism-Leninism is, of necessity, under the domination and control of the Soviet Union" (R. 32). The Board "documented" this conclusion by a few fragmentary quotations from Marxist works, the latest of which (Dimitroff's United Front) was written in 1935 (R. 31-32).

From these quotations, the Board found that: (1) "the Soviet Union has a specific place in Marxism-Leninism;" (2) "it represents the first victory of the proletariat;" (3) "it is the center of the world proletariat and it is entitled to the allegiance of the proletariat everywhere;" and

(4) "the authority of its Communist Party is international." The Board then concluded that "the corollary of this is that a Communist Party which adheres to Marxism-Leninism is, of necessity, under the domination and control of the Soviet Union" (R. 32; emphasis supplied). The Board's corollary, however, has no foundation either in its premises or in the documentation.

The excerpts quoted by the Board are to the effect that the views of the leaders of the Soviet Union are entitled to great respect from all Communists because the Soviet Union was the first country to carry through a socialist revolution. It is in this sense, as the excerpts make plain, that the "authority" of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union is "international." The excerpts do not assert, as the Board states, that the Soviet Union is entitled to the "allegiance" of the world proletariat. What they do say is that the first socialist state, then in its formative period and surrounded by hostile capitalist states, deserves the friendship and support of working people everywhere, and that its survival is fundamentally important to the cause of world peace and democracy, as well as to the eventual establishment of socialism in other lands.

All that the quotations cited by the Board establish is that the Soviet Union occupies much the same position of authority and prestige among Communists that the United States held among republicans in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. The establishment of the American Republic first demonstrated the practicality of the theories of government expounded by Locke, Rousseau, and other enlightened thinkers of the eighteenth century.[67a] As a result, the United States had "a specific place" in the revolutionary movements of the period. It became the "center" of the world movement against absolutism. The "authority" of its leaders—Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Paine, and the rest—was "international." The principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and their practical application in the Constitution provided a pattern which was heavily relied on by the republicans of other lands. The United States attracted to itself the support of republicans everywhere who gave practical assistance to its struggle for freedom. Yet it would be absurd to conclude as a "corollary" of these facts, that the leaders of the French and Mexican revolutions were "dominated and controlled" by the United States or operated to effectuate its policies.[68] The Board's conclusion from similar facts relating to the Soviet Union is equally absurd.

[67a] By the Board's reasoning, the American revolution of 1776 must have been the work of "foreign agents," since Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Madison, Paine, and other American revolutionary leaders adopted and put into practice the theories of government expounded by Englishmen, Frenchmen, and other Europeans. The Declaration of Independence was, by the Board's logic, a product of foreign directives, for it was Locke and Rousseau who had

Marxism-Leninism Does Not Require the Existence of an International Communist Organization.

The Report asserts that one of the "directives" of the classical Communist writers is advocacy of international revolution "through the instrumentality of an international organization" (R. 25).

It rests this assertion on the finding that "international and revolutionary factors" are basic to Marxism-Leninism earlier taught such seditious doctrine as that all men are endowed with inalienable rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it.

[68] Nevertheless, this charge was made. In 1820, Count Metternich wrote: "These United States * * * have cast blame and scorn on the institutions of Europe most worthy of respect * * * fostering revolutions wherever they show themselves * * * they lend new strength to the apostles of sedition and reanimate the courage of every conspirator." (Quoted by Dexter Perkins in Hands Off! A History of the Monroe Doctrine.)

(R. 24). This finding contains an element of validity, in that Marxist-Leninist literature teaches that the economic laws governing social and political development, in accordance with which capitalism supplanted feudalism, will in turn inevitably give rise to the establishment of a socialist society in every country of the world.[69] From this generalization, the Board concluded that "it is inescapable that all those working for the ultimate ends of the movement must work in unison and in one cohesive organization on a world-wide basis" (R. 24, emphasis added). The Report does not say why this conclusion is "inescapable" and in fact it is a palpable non-sequitur. The single excerpt the Report quotes to support its conclusion says nothing whatsoever about an international organization (R. 24).

Furthermore, even if the Board's conclusion were logical, it is irrelevant. The relevant inquiry is not what is "inescapable" from the literature, but what has actually taken place. The third and last world organization of Marxist parties, the Third International, concededly dissolved in 1943 (R. 14-15), and, as we have seen, the Board makes no finding that it was succeeded by any other organization.

The Principle of Democratic Centralism Has No Relevance to the Issue of Foreign Control.

The Board found that petitioner's "use of the organizational principle known as 'democratic centralism'" proves that it operates pursuant to Soviet directives and for the purpose of effectuating Soviet policies (R. 56-57).

The Board correctly stated that democratic centralism is a Communist principle of organization which provides for the following: (1) election of all officers and leading committees; (2) free discussion of all policy questions preceding a majority decision of the appropriate party organizations; (3) acceptance by the minority of majority decisions and their execution by the entire membership (R. 56).

[69] It is also indisputable that these "international and revolutionary factors" are not the product of Soviet "directives" but were basic to Marxism from its inception. The Report documents its statement as to these factors by references to the Communist Manifesto of 1848 (R. 24).

In discussing the petitioner's application of this principle, the Board noted the testimony of petitioner's witnesses that democratic centralism establishes procedures under which control of the organization is vested in its members. It then cited the testimony of three of the Attorney General's witnesses to the effect that petitioner is ruled "from the top down and not from the bottom up" (R. 56-57). That testimony, even it were true, is beside the point. The relevant question is not in what direction authority runs, but whether the "top" is domestic or foreign.

The Board found that the "top" was foreign prior to 1940 on the ground that during the period of petitioner's affiliation to the Communist International, democratic centralism obliged it to accept decisions arrived at by that organization. However, the petitioner disaffiliated from the Communist International in 1940, and the latter dissolved in 1943. Subsequent to 1943, therefore, there was no international organization within which democratic centralism could operate. Faced with a complete absence of any evidence of international affiliation of petitioner after 1940, as a possible source of foreign "directives" through the operation of democratic centralism, the Board took refuge in a fiat. It stated that in view of petitioner's former affiliation with the Communist International, "it is reasonable to conclude, and we do so, that [petitioner's] continued following of the principle of democratic centralism keeps [petitioner] within the authority of the Soviet Union" (R. 57). This conclusion is not only wildly illogical, but also contrary to the uncontradicted evidence.

Petitioner's constitution provides that its national convention, a delegated body elected by the membership, is its highest governing body, and that, in the interval between conventions, this authority vests in its national committee, elected by the convention (A.G. Ex. 374; R. 1698-1704). Petitioner's witness Gates testified that petitioner is a self-governing organization which applies democratic centralism as its internal principle of organization (R. 1204-5, 1224). The Attorney General's witness Lautner corroborated this testimony, stating that democratic centralism "pertains to rules and regulations by which the Communist Party governs itself" (R. 965, emphasis added).[70] There is no evidence to the contrary.[71]

Petitioner's Views on Imperialism and Its Programs with Respect to Labor, the Negro People and Youth Have No Relevance to the "Directives and Policies" Test.

The Report discusses at great length petitioner's views on imperialism and its emphasis on programs to advance the interests and win the adherence, of workers, the Negro people, and youth (R. 44-56, 64-78). On the premise that Marxism-Leninism is a series of orders from the Soviet Union, the Board concluded that the fact that petitioner's views and activities in these fields are based on Marxist-Leninist principles proves that petitioner complies with Soviet directives within the meaning of section 13(e)(1) (R. 64). The premise being fallacious, the conclusion falls. All that the Board's discussion of these programs demonstrates is that they represent an application of Communist principles. Thus the Board again relied upon its fallacious version of the "non-deviation" criterion (see infra, p. 137) to support its findings on "directives and policies."

[70] The Board's description of Lautner's testimony in footnote 26 of the Report (R. 28) is a complete invention, as can be seen by examining the testimony which the Board's Annotated Report cites. See R. 1854, ftn. 1, and R. 973-974.

[71] The Board's inference of foreign control from petitioner's practice of the principle of self-criticism (i.e., that a political party should openly acknowledge, discuss, and correct its mistakes) is likewise unsupported by evidence or reason. This is apparent from the face of the Report (R. 57-58).

The Report also finds that petitioner's views and activities in these fields were formulated and performed for the purpose of effectuating Soviet policies, within the meaning of section 13(e)(1). This finding is based solely on the content of these views and activities. It is clear, however, that their content establishes nothing of the sort.

The first view to which the Report refers is that the United States is an imperialist country[72] (R. 44). The Board's thesis is that the concept of imperialism, and particularly the view that the United States is an imperialist power, is a view which can be attributed only to Soviet origin. As literate persons are aware, however, the concept of imperialism and the characterization of the United States since the turn of the century as an imperialist country are neither Marxist-Leninist inventions nor imports from abroad. Lenin started his book "Imperialism, the Highest Stage of Capitalism," by acknowledging his indebtedness to the book, "Imperialism," written in 1902 by the "bourgeois" English economist, J. A. Hobson (A.G. Ex. 140, p. 15). Almost a quarter of a century before the Russian revolution, distinguished non-Marxist Americans organized the Anti-Imperialist League in opposition to the Spanish-American war, the conquest of Cuba, and the annexation of the Philippines (Tr. 15705). And if critiques of American imperialism are the product of Soviet "directives" then [72] The Report nowhere states what Communists mean by imperialism, except to make the egregious error (R. 45) of saying that Lenin "designates capitalism as 'imperialism'." The record is replete with oral and documentary testimony on the meaning of the term "imperialism." The term refers to the "highest" stage of capitalism, with characteristics which distinguish it from earlier stages. See, for example, Lenin's Imperialism (A.G. Ex. 140, particularly pp. 88-89, and R. 1521-2, where imperialism is defined) and the testimony of Dr. Herbert Aptheker, R. 1273-4. Had the Board paid any attention to this evidence, it might at least have avoided the error of stating that "all countries other than those of a victorious socialist revolution—which encompasses only the Soviet Union and those brought within its orbit—are chacterized as 'imperialist' * * * " (R. 45-6).

some of America's foremost historians and political scientists are foreign agents.[73]

Associated with its discussion of imperialism is the Board's treatment of the concept of just and unjust wars. As the Report states, Communists hold that a war to liberate an oppressed people from the yoke of imperialism is just and should be supported while a war to conquer or enslave others is unjust and should be opposed (R. 25). This concept, too, is neither a Russian invention nor unique to Communists. Indeed, the Record shows that petitioner's teaching on this question was drawn not only from Marxist sources, but from the precepts and conduct of men like Lincoln and Grant (who opposed the Mexican War of 1848), Mark Twain and Carl Schurz (who opposed the Spanish American War), Eugene V. Debs and Robert LaFollette, Sr. (who opposed World War I); and from the charter establishing the Nuremberg War Crimes Tribunal, which denounces aggressive war as criminal and abolishes the defense of superior orders (R. 1239-41).[74]

[73] Including Charles A. and Mary R. Beard, Parker T. Moon, David S. Muzzey, John A. Krout, Ray Allen Billington, B. J. Loewenberg, and S. A. Brockunier (Tr. 13560-62). Defenders of American imperialism also recognize the accuracy of this characterization. Thus, Dr. Virgil Jordan, President of the National Industrial Conference Board, in an address delivered before the 1940 annual convention of the Investment Bankers Association, had this to say on the subject: "Southward in our hemisphere and westward in the Pacific, the path of empire takes its way, and in modern terms of economic power as well as political prestige, the sceptre passes to the United States. We may be afraid of the unfamiliar term imperialism in connection with the commitment we have made. We may prefer in the current American fashion to disguise it in a vague phrase like 'hemisphere defense,' but consciously or unawarely America has been destined to that career by its temperament, capacity and resources and by the drift of world events, not merely in recent years, but since the beginning of the century and certainly since the last war" (Tr. 15665).

[74] In a speech before the Sixth International Congress on Penal Law, Pope Pius XII declared that "unjust war is to be accounted one of the very gravest crimes that international law must proscribe, and the authors of it are in every case guilty and liable to punishment that has been agreed upon." N. Y. Times, October 4, 1953, p. 1.

The Board also purported to find evidence of the advancement of Soviet objectives in the fact that since 1945 petitioner has emphasized peace as the central and most urgent issue facing the American people and has criticized the American cold-war policy as aggressive (R. 52-55, 48). Thus the Board equated loyalty to the United States and freedom from Soviet control with unconditional support of the cold war. Moreover, the Board ignored the uncontradicted evidence of the independent origin of petitioner's position on international questions.

Petitioner's position since 1945 has been based on the analysis contained in its July 1945 convention resolution (A. G. Ex. 210). In accordance with that analysis, petitioner has opposed cold war policies of the national administration as a threat to peace. It has consistently urged a return to the successful World War II policy of U. S.-Soviet cooperation and the settlement of disputes among nations by peaceful negotiation. Petitioner has been guided by the conviction that World War III is not inevitable and that peaceful co-existence of the capitalist and socialist systems is possible on the basis of mutually beneficial diplomatic, trade and cultural relations and peaceful competition. It has supported the proposals of non-Communist individuals and governments which it believed to be in the interests of peace. (A. G. Ex. 210, pp. 819-820; A. G. Ex. 378, p. 7; C. P. Ex. 55, p. 31; Tr. 14807-14808, 14811-14816). Even the Attorney General's witness Lautner, in testimony quoted in the Report (R. 52), stated that petitioner's 1945 analysis preceded a comparable analysis by the Soviet Union.[75]

The Board also saw evidence of a purpose to promote Soviet policies in the fact that petitioner attaches major importance to programs and activities in behalf of American workers, the Negro people, and young people (R. 64-78). The record is clear, and the Report acknowledges, that the petitioner has worked assiduously to promote what most people consider desirable reforms in American life—such as strengthening of the trade union movement, the enactment of social security and other welfare legislation, the elimination of discrimination against the Negro people, etc. (R. 77).

Obviously, however, it is nonsense to infer foreign control from the fact that a political party works among, and seeks to attract the adherence of, major groups of our population. By such a test, every American political party would stand condemned as a "foreign agent."

It is equally nonsensical to infer advancement of Soviet objectives from activities designed to achieve social reforms which many non-Communists likewise believe in and work for. The Board arrived at this startling result by stating that petitioner has a bad motive in carrying out its good work. It said that petitioner's "trade union work, youth work, and national minorities work could only have as their aim the effectuation of the policies of the Soviet Union with respect to the world Communist movement" (R. 78, emphasis added). Thus petitioner is condemned because the Board thinks that work for social betterment must be inspired by ulterior motives.[76]

[76] By this logic, trade unions and religious and cultural organizations which work for similar objectives "could only have as their aim the effectuation of the policies" of Communists, and are therefore to be condemned as Communist-front or Communist-infiltrated organizations. The Attorney General has applied this logic in petitions against alleged Communist-front organizations. The following is a typical allegation of such a petition: "The Committee supported the views, policies and objectives of the Communist Party by opposing the enactment of certain legislation regarded by the Party as inimical to its interests such as the Mundt-Nixon bill, the Hobbs bill, and the Internal Security Act of 1950." Paragraph III(4)(c) of Amended Petition in Brownell v. American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, Docket No. 109-53, Subversive Activities Control Board.

The real basis for the Board's order, therefore, becomes apparent. Petitioner is held to be a seditious foreign agent because it opposes those governmental policies which it believes threaten peace, weaken the trade union movement, perpetuate racial discrimination, undermine the living standards of the people, and infringe civil liberties. Petitioner is condemned by its political opponents on the basis of their hostility to its views. Thus the Board obediently fulfills the purpose of the Act to suppress political opposition under the pretext of protecting the national security.

2. The "Non-Deviation" Criterion.

As the Report states (R. 80), the Attorney General's evidence on "non-deviation" consisted primarily of the testimony of his "expert" witness, Mosely. The Board's conclusions likewise rest on this testimony.[77]

On direct examination, Mosely testified that the Communist Party and the Soviet Union held similar or "parallel" views on each of 44 different issues dealing exclusively with international relations and foreign affairs, and ranging in time and subject from the League of Nations in 1919 to the Korean War in 1950. With respect to each issue, he identified documents which purportedly "illustrated" the asserted similarity or parallelism. All of these documents were received in evidence (R. 80).

The Mosely testimony and exhibits had no tendency, however, to prove "non-deviation" within the meaning of section 13(e)(2), and had no rational relation to the 3(3) definition of a Communist-action organization. In relying on this evidence, the Board and the court below violated section 13(e) and compounded the unconstitutionality of that section on its face, in four respects: (1) They rejected consideration of the date sequence of the views of the petitioner and the Soviet Union, respectively. (2) They excluded proof of the truth, reasonableness, or general acceptance of the views. (3) They relied on views which they conceded could well advance the best interests of the United States. (4) They excluded proof that the petitioner arrived at its views independently.

The Date-Sequence Error

Mosely at no time testified that petitioner's views on the 44 issues to which he addressed himself did not "deviate" from those of the Soviet Union. Instead, he stated that the views of each were "parallel," or "similar."

The Act, however, requires proof of "non-deviation." A parallelism or similarity of views is something quite different from "non-deviation." The dictionary definition of "deviation" is "variation from the common way, from an established standard, position, etc."[78] Accordingly, deviation or non-deviation cannot occur unless there is a pre-existing "established standard, position, etc." from which it is possible to deviate.

Applying this definition to section 13(e)(2), non-deviation can be proved only by showing, (1) that the Soviet Union first established a position on a given issue; and (2) that, thereafter, petitioner, knowing of the Soviet position, did not "deviate" from it, but expressed a similar view or policy on the given issue.

Any contrary construction of section 13(e)(2) leads to an absurd result. A parallelism of ideas can have no conceivable relation to the issue of foreign control unless it appears that the alleged domestic agent adopted ideas previously enunciated by its alleged foreign principal. It is impossible to infer foreign "domination and control" from a showing that the alleged domestic agent adopted its views in advance of the adoption of similar views by its alleged foreign principal.

Yet the indispensable element of chronological sequence is absent from the record. At no time did the Attorney General offer any evidence that the Soviet view on a subject dealt with by Mosely was adopted, much less communicated, prior to petitioner's adoption of a view on the same subject. On the contrary, the Attorney General took the position that he was not required by the Act to show, and would make no attempt to show, that the Soviet view antedated the petitioner's view (R. 81-82, 836; Tr. 10934-10935). Although relying on the foreign and domestic exhibits offered through Mosely to illustrate views of the Soviet Union and the petitioner on particular subjects, the Attorney General expressly disclaimed the materiality of their date sequences. As the Report points out, the Attorney General insisted that these exhibits were selected for their content alone, and were not intended to establish priority of the Soviet view (R. 81-82).[79] The Attorney General resisted petitioner's attempt to show that its views on particular questions were advanced before the Soviet Union had spoken on the same question. He admitted, inter alia (R. 836):

> "As I am saying, we have not made any attempt to show how the Communist Party reached the views that it did. All we are attempting to show is that it reached the view."

Accordingly, even if the Mosely testimony is accepted in its entirety, it establishes no more than the bare fact that the petitioner and the Soviet Union have held similar views on a number of international questions. There is nothing in his testimony on which to predicate a finding that the petitioner did not "deviate" from Soviet policies. Nor did the Board make any determination of the date sequence of the views in question independently of Mosely's testimony. Instead, it relied on all of the examples testified to by Mosely indiscriminately. It did so despite the uncontradicted testimony of petitioner's witness, Gates, that petitioner has often taken positions in advance of the Soviet Union and has taken positions on many questions as to which the Soviet Union has never expressed a view (R. 1227).

In affirming the finding of the Board, the court below dismissed petitioner's contention that consideration of the date sequence of the views was required by the terms of section 13(e)(2) with the statement (R. 2146) that, "The statutory phrase refers to identity or coincidence and not to chronological adoption." Accordingly, both the Board and the court below misconstrued section 13(e)(2) by substituting similarity of views for "non-deviation."

If the "non-deviation" criterion is to have any possible relevance in establishing that a domestic organization is the agent of a foreign principal and operates to advance the policies of the latter, the application of the criterion must be confined to views and policies which are peculiarly characteristic of the alleged principal. For example, it would be absurd to infer from proof that two organizations oppose racial discrimination and segregation that one is "dominated or controlled" by the other or operates "to advance the objectives of the other." Yet the Board and the court below relied on views of this character in concluding that the evidence satisfied the "non-deviation" criterion.

The hearing panel precluded petitioner from proving that the views involved in Mosely's testimony were true, reasonable, or generally accepted by individuals and groups (including, in some instances, the United States government) concededly not under Soviet control or engaged in promoting Soviet policies.[80] The Board affirmed this ruling (R. 80), concurring in the position taken by the Attorney General (Tr. 8878) that "it does not matter whether the Soviet view on these issues which were raised were [sic] right or wrong, or whether the Soviet view was held by many people, by some people, or by all the people." The court below affirmed the finding of the Board on "non-deviation" without discussion of this question (R. 2146, 2148).

This application of the non-deviation criterion predicated the finding that petitioner is a seditious, foreign-controlled organization in part upon such entirely legitimate and widely held views as advocacy of negotiations for a cease-fire in Korea, advocacy of the seating of the Peoples Republic of China in the U. N., and the belief that the Syngman Rhee regime was a corrupt dictatorship (R. 83-84). It is plain that so applied the non-deviation test is wholly irrational.

The Error of Relying on Views Which May Promote the Welfare of the United States.

The Attorney General did not contend that any of the views testified to by Mosely were dangerous, seditious or opposed to the national interests of the United States, but took the position that that question was "wholly irrelevant" (Tr. 9059). The hearing panel, in rulings affirmed by the [80] For example, these rulings were applied to the following views, among others: that there should be negotiations for a cease-fire in Korea (R. 864); that the Chiang Kai-shek regime was a corrupt dictatorship (R. 836-7); that the establishment of a second front in World War II was desirable (R. 844-5); that the League of Nations as originally organized promoted imperialist purposes (R. 839; Tr. 9063); that the defendants in the 1937 Soviet treason trials were guilty as charged (R. 840); that Oatis' confession of espionage was true (R. 845); that the Syngman Rhee government was a corrupt police state (R. 862-4). Citations are to exclusions on cross-examination. For renewal of the exclusionary rulings to prevent the proof in petitioner's affirmative case, see R. 1274-5.

Board (R. 81), precluded petitioner from establishing that views testified to by Mosely were calculated to promote the peace and well-being of the United States,[81] and even from showing that some of these views became the official policy of our government.[82] Nevertheless, the Board relied on these views to support its finding under the "objectives" component of the section 3(3) definition that petitioner operates to promote the seditious objectives attributed to the world Communist movement by section 2 (R. 80-86). The irrationality of this application of section 13(e)(2) is clear.

The opinion below did not discuss this aspect of the Board's application of the "non-deviation" criteron. It replied to petitioner's contention that there is no rational relation between this criterion and the "objectives" component of the section 3(3) definition, by holding that section 13(e)(2) is addressed solely to the "domination and control" component of the definition (R. 2122). This being the case, the court was obliged to reverse the Board's order. For on the court's own premise, the Board plainly erred in using its finding on non-deviation to support its ultimate finding on the "objectives" component.

At most, "non-deviation" supplies tenuous circumstantial evidence of the "domination and control" element of the section 3(3) definition. The fact that two people or organizations hold similar views in a particular field of thought may, and usually does, have nothing to do with domination by one over the other. The similarity may arise from the voluntary acceptance by each of a common premise. Thus all pacifists will oppose a particular war.

[82] E.g., desirability of a second front in World War II and of negotiating a cease-fire in Korea (R. 844-45, 864).

The hearing panel, however, precluded petitioner from proving that the similarities of views of petitioner and the Soviet Union on various international questions were attributable to the independent application by each of the premises and analytical approach supplied by Marxist principles.[83]

The Board affirmed the panel's rulings on this as on all other matters affecting the Mosely testimony (R. 80). Nevertheless, it then proceeded to reject petitioner's contention that similarities between views of petitioner and those of the Soviet Union and Communists of other lands are attributable to the independent application by each of Marxist-Leninist principles. It did so on the ground that "the great weight of the evidence is to the contrary" (R. 86).

The Board failed to state what this evidence was, and in fact there is none.[84] Worse, it concealed the fact that any lack of evidence by petitioner on this issue was the result of the panel ruling, affirmed by the Board, excluding proof on the subject. Moreover, Mosely testified that he was unable to conclude from the similarities of the views of petitioner and the Soviet Union that the former had not arrived at its views independently. He regarded the exhibits introduced through him only as evidence of the views and reasoning expressed therein, "but not of the thought processes or political processes by which one or the other arrived at the position which he stated" (R. 837-38). The Board, however, brushed aside the expert's evaluation of his own testimony (R. 81).

[83] For example, petitioner's counsel asked Mosely whether petitioner's opposition to World War II at the time of its outbreak in 1939 was not based on Marxist concepts as to the cause and nature of wars and the distinction between just and unjust wars. Counsel for the Attorney General objected to the question as irrelevant, stating: "It does not make any difference how they arrived at the view as to the war" (R. 842). In the colloquy that followed, counsel for the petitioner addressed the following question to the panel chairman and received the following reply (R. 843): "Mr. Marcantonio: * * * In other words how [petitioner] came about reaching certain decisions and taking certain public positions on various issues is irrelevant? Mr. Brown: Yes, sir."

[84] The Board's annotation of its Report to the record gives no citations to document this conclusion (R. 1959).

The Board also brushed aside (R. 85) the uncontradicted testimony of petitioner's witnesses that petitioner formulated and arrived at its views independently. It ignored the testimony of petitioner's witness, Gates (R. 1225-26), that petitioner's frequent agreement with Soviet views on international questions resulted from its own independent analysis of the situation from a Marxist point of view and its conclusion that the Soviet position was in the interest of world peace and hence in the interest of the American people.

The court below, in sustaining the finding of the Board on "non-deviation," stated (R. 2146) that it was petitioner's position that "the identity of views of the Soviet Union and the Party is a coincidence." As we have seen, however, that was not petitioner's contention nor was it the testimony of its witnesses. The court failed to answer the contention which we did make. Like the Board, it held that the similarity of some of petitioner's views to those of the Soviet Union was per se evidence of domination and control. It also disregarded the uncontradicted testimony that petitioner arrived at its views independently, as well as our contention that the panel and the Board erred in precluding cross-examination of Mosely designed to show the independent origin of petitioner's views.

3. The "Financial Aid" Criterion.

The Report shows on its face that the Board misapplied the "financial aid" criterion in making a finding adverse to petitioner under section 13(e)(3).

a. The Board did not and could not find that petitioner "receives" foreign financial or other aid, as required by section 13(e)(3). All that it found (R. 86-88) was that there were instances in which petitioner received such aid in the past, all prior to the date of the Act.[85]

b. The Board did not find, and could not find, that the donor attached conditions to the alleged past financial aid. Accordingly, the alleged aid provides no rational basis for inferring even past domination or control (see supra, p. 49).

On the face of the Report, petitioner was entitled to a finding that it does not receive foreign financial aid. The Board made no such finding. Instead, it concluded that its findings of past financial aid "are relevant to the ultimate issue in this proceeding in the light of the whole record" (R. 89). The brief of the Board in the court below stated (p. 101): "It is of course evident from this finding that the Board could not have based great reliance thereon in reaching its ultimate conclusion." Be that as it may, the Board did support its ultimate conclusion, in part, upon its finding on "financial aid," and its action was affirmed by the court below (R. 2148). This was plainly error since the Board's own version of the evidence required a finding in petitioner's favor. The Act prohibits the issuance of a registration order on the basis of conduct which an accused organization discontinued prior to the enactment of the Act (infra, p. 160).

[85] The only instance claimed by the Board subsequent to 1940 is the asserted receipt in 1949 by International Publishers of some Soviet book plates and English translations of books (R. 88). This assertion is based on the Board's misrepresentation of testimony by Harvey Matusow, subsequently acknowledged by him to be false (infra, pp. 207-08). Moreover, the Board found that International Publishers is "a Soviet Union publishing organization" (R. 87). If that be true, the alleged 1949 transaction was between two Soviet agencies and not a contribution of financial aid to petitioner. We also later show (infra, pp. 208-09) that the Board's findings on financial aid in 1940 and earlier years were based on testimony proven to be false.

4. The "Instruction and Training" Criterion.

The Board found that "there is no substantial evidence of record showing training of [petitioner's] members in the Soviet Union subsequent to the outbreak of World War II" (R. 92).[86]

On the Board's own statement of the evidence, therefore, petitioner was clearly entitled to a finding under section 13(e)(4) that it does not send any members or representatives to any foreign country for instruction or training. But as in the case of "financial aid," the Board refused to favor petitioner with the negative finding that the record compels. Instead, it indulged in vaporous speculation as to why petitioner had not engaged in this practice for the preceding seventeen years (R. 92-93). It then proceeded, in violation of section 13(e)(4), to base its order, in part, upon a practice that concededly was abandoned fourteen years prior to the enactment of the Act (R. 93). The court below affirmed this action of the Board without discussion (R. 2148-49).

5. The "Reporting" Criterion.

The Board found under section 13(e)(5) that on a number of occasions prior to petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International representatives of petitioner made reports on its activities to various bodies of that organization (R. 93-4). The last occasion on which it found such "reporting" was 1935 (R. 93).

The only subsequent "reporting" found by the Board rests on its absurd treatment of a few incidents, all of which occurred prior to the date of the Act.

[86] In fact, as the Report shows on its face, there is no evidence whatsoever of any study abroad by petitioner's members subsequent to 1936 (R. 90).

a. The Board found that "it is reasonable to conclude" that petitioner "has reported more recently [than 1940] to the Soviet Union." This finding was based exclusively on testimony of Harvey Matusow (R. 94). Matusow testified that one Lou Diskin had said that in 1949, after attending a World Youth Festival of the World Federation of Democratic Youth in Budapest, he stayed on "to deliver some reports on the American youth movement to that group, to the Cominform representatives" (R. 1032). It is clear from the Board's own statement of this hearsay testimony that even if true it has no relevancy to prove the "reporting" standard. For there was no evidence that Diskin (a) reported on behalf or at the request of petitioner; (b) reported the views or activities of petitioner; (c) reported anything more than his personal views and observations on the subject of American youth; or (d) used the word "reports" in his alleged account in the sense of a communication which a subordinate makes to a superior.[87] There was, therefore, no basis from which the Board could "reasonably conclude" that petitioner reported to the Soviet Union in 1949. Moreover, the Board itself subsequently held in another proceeding that no finding can stand on testimony of the notorious and admitted perjurer Matusow (infra, p. 213).

b. The Report (R. 95) alludes to the fact that Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, a member of petitioner's National Committee, visited France in 1945, 1949, and 1950, where, as she testified, she met Communists from other countries and in the course of conversation naturally exchanged experiences (R. 1277-82, 1298).[88] The Board did not find that [87] In addition, of course, there is nothing to suggest that the alleged recipients of the "report" used it as an instrument of control over petitioner (see supra, p. 50).

[88] The Report emphasizes the fact that during her 1945 trip to France, Miss Flynn even met Communists from the Soviet Union (R. 95). It ignores her uncontradicted testimony that these Russians these conversations were "reports." But it used these trips as a basis for its findings on reporting and concealed the uncontradicted testimony of Miss Flynn that she did not report to anyone (R. 1282).

c. The Report asserts that "by means unknown, contents of an important letter written by William Z. Foster concerning [petitioner's] affairs were communicated to Jacques Duclos, General Secretary of the Communist Party in France and a former member of the Executive Committee of the Communist International" (R. 95).[89]

The Report does not specifically describe the Foster letter as a "report" to a foreign principal, but it insinuates as much. However, the undisputed evidence established that it could not conceivably have been a "report" within the meaning of the Act. The letter was addressed to petitioner's National Committee. There was no evidence whatsoever that petitioner or Foster sent it to Duclos or intended that it should be brought to Duclos' attention. Moreover, the letter was a statement by Foster of his personal dissent from petitioner's policies (see A. G. Ex. 208), not a "report" by or on behalf of petitioner.

d. The Report asserts that petitioner "reported" to the Soviet Union by means of greetings which it sent to organizations and individuals on anniversary occasions (R. 95).

were all delegates to an international gathering of women and that Miss Flynn's conversation with them concerned child care, post-war reconstruction, and the rights of women (R. 1298). The Report's discussion of Miss Flynn's trips distorts her testimony in other respects as well, particularly by giving the false impression that she made the trips in order to hold the conversations referred to. In fact, the conversations were casual, incidental episodes which occurred during trips made by Miss Flynn as a newspaper correspondent or to attend conventions or affairs (R. 1277-82, 1298).

[89] The Report fixes no date for this communication. Since the Foster letter was referred to by Duclos in an article published in April, 1945 (A.G. Ex. 208), it is evident that the contents of that letter were known to him prior to that time.

The only such greeting cited by the Report during the last quarter of a century is a telegram addressed to Joseph Stalin on the occasion of his seventieth birthday in 1949 and released for publication. This telegram reiterated petitioner's well-known and widely publicized opposition to the Truman foreign policy, expressed confidence that the American people would prevent the outbreak of a new war and achieve an American-Soviet pact of peace and friendship, and wished a long life to Stalin and to his contributions to peace, democracy and socialism (R. 97). In an effort to torture some sinister significance out of this incident the Report states that "it is reasonable to conclude" that the language of the telegram was "possessed of veiled content" (R. 98). Just why the conclusion was reasonable, what this "veiled content" was, and what information it "reported" that was not already well known through petitioner's repeated public statements, the Report does not bother to state.

It is apparent from the foregoing that the Board cited no evidence whatsoever that at least since 1935 petitioner has "reported" within any rational meaning of section 13(e)(5). Nor did the Board find the "extent to which" petitioner reported, as it was required to do so by that section. Much less did it cite any evidence that what it irrationally designated as "reports" were used by the Soviet Union to establish or assert "direction, domination or control" over petitioner.

Finally, even under the Board's nonsensical concept of "reports," it cited none subsequent to 1949, one year prior to the date of the Act. Clearly, even on the Board's erroneous application of the Act's irrational premises, petitioner was entitled to a favorable finding under section 13(a)(5). Yet, abandoning all pretense of reliance on fact, law or logic, the Board concluded that petitioner "reports to the Soviet Union and its representatives" (R. 98).

The court below struck this finding on the ground that the evidence did not support a finding of "constant, systematic reporting as of now" (R. 2149). The court stated, however (ibid.):

> "The evidence indicates instances [of reporting], as in the cases of Eisler and Peters. . . . There is a preponderance of evidence, we think, to support a conclusion that upon occasion leaders of the Party report to representatives of the Soviet Union."

The court's statement, however, is wholly lacking in evidentiary support. As to Peters, there was no evidence that he was ever a representative of the Communist International or the Soviet Union. The Board conceded in its brief below that its contrary finding is inaccurate (see infra, p. 209). As to Eisler, there was no evidence that he was a representative of the Communist International after 1936 (see ibid.). Moreover, as the Report states (pp. 60-61), both Peters and Eisler left the United States in 1949 so that in no event could their activities in this country provide the basis for a finding of even occasional reporting "as of now"—i.e., subsequent to the date of the Act. The court below did not indicate what other "cases" it had in mind as supplying evidence of current occasional reporting. In fact, however, there are none in the record, and as we have seen, the Report cites none.

6. The "Discipline" Criterion.

In applying section 13(a)(6), the Report first quotes statements from a number of American and foreign Communists to establish the proposition (which petitioner itself asserts) that the petitioner, like the Communist Parties of other countries, places great emphasis on the need for internal unity and discipline, demands adherence to party decisions, and condemns factionalism and opportunism among its members (R. 100-01). Obviously, however, petitioner's practice of internal discipline furnishes no evidence that it or its members are under foreign discipline. In an effort to show otherwise, the Report refers back to its discussion of democratic centralism under the "directives and policies test" (R. 99, 103-04). But as we have shown (supra, pp. 130-32), the Board's own analysis of democratic centralism supplied no evidence of foreign directives or discipline. Indeed, in that prior discussion, the Report makes a forward reference to its findings on "discipline" to support its claim that democratic centralism involves foreign directives (R. 57). Thus the Board used the absence of evidence under either test to support adverse findings under both.

Essentially, the Board found that petitioner and its members are subject to foreign discipline because it and other Communist Parties believe that members of a political party should be held to strict adherence to party decisions. Thus the Board assimilated the "discipline" criterion to its erroneous concept of "non-deviation."

The Board also treated what it called "specific instances of record" in which, in its view, the Soviet Union has exercised disciplinary power.

1. The Report cites four occasions on which members of petitioner were allegedly expelled or otherwise disciplined on the initiative of the Communist International during the period of petitioner's affiliation with that organization (R. 102). The most recent of these occurred in 1934.

2. The Report states that in the early 1930's, several of petitioner's members performed missions in foreign countries on behalf of the Communist International (R. 104).

3. It cites a statement by William Z. Foster, petitioner's chairman, that he would have faced expulsion had he conducted a minority factional fight against the policies initiated by Earl Browder and approved by the Party when it dissolved and formed the Communist Political Association in 1944. It then states that after the Foster position prevailed and the Party was reconstituted at a 1945 convention, Browder was expelled for conducting a factional fight against the convention decision (R. 103). These matters were clearly instances of internal discipline. The Report seems to hint that Foster's apprehensions in 1944 and the expulsion of Browder for factionalism in 1945 were inspired by the Soviet Union. But it refers to no evidence to that effect, and there is none.

4. The Report cites petitioner's expulsion of three members, one in 1940 for opportunism (R. 102), one in 1950 for being a police spy (R. 103), and one in 1951 for urging others to distribute anti-Soviet leaflets (R. 103). The Report does not suggest that the Soviet Union had anything whatsoever to do with any of these cases of internal discipline, and no such suggestion could be supported by the record.

5. The Report alludes to the stringent criticism of the Titoist regime in Yugoslavia by the Communist Information Bureau and states that petitioner agreed with this criticism (R. 103).

The alleged incidents which occurred during petitioner's membership in the Communist International sixteen or more years prior to the Act, the more recent scattered instances of internal discipline, and petitioner's agreement with the condemnation of Tito, cannot conceivably support the Board's finding that petitioner and its members are subject to Soviet discipline. Instead, the testimony of petitioner's witnesses that its leaders and members are not subject to and do not recognize the disciplinary power of any foreign government or organization (R. 1223-24) was uncontradicted.

The court below sustained the finding of the Board under section 13(e)(6) (R. 2149-50). Yet plainly, on the Board's own showing, petitioner was entitled to a favorable finding under the "discipline" criterion.

7. The "Secret Practices" Criterion.

As we have seen, section 13(e)(7) makes relevant the use of "secret practices" only if their purpose is either to conceal foreign control or to promote the objectives of the organization (supra, p. 51).

Eleven pages of the Report (R. 105-16) are devoted to examples of "secret practices," most of which have to do with precautions against the disclosure of the identity of petitioner's members. The existence of such precautionary practices was conceded in the answer and testified to by petitioner's witness Gates (R. 181; 1216-23).

The final two pages of this section of the Report are captioned "Purpose of Secret Practices" (R. 116-117), and are presumably devoted to a discussion of this essential element of the proof. Most of this text, however, consists of a reiteration of examples of "secret practices" previously noted. The Board did not and could not cite evidence that these practices were engaged in for the purpose of concealing foreign control or promoting petitioner's objectives.

On the contrary, the uncontradicted evidence negatives the existence of the two prescribed purposes. As the record shows and the Report concedes, the petitioner's testimony was that precautionary practices were employed to safeguard its members against economic, social and physical persecution and to protect them from unjust prosecution and snooping by police agents and informers (R. 116, 1216-23). In this respect, petitioner's practices are identical with those employed by trade unions when necessary to safeguard their members from similar persecution (R. 1220-21). The Attorney General's evidence did not contradict, but largely corroborated, this testimony.[90]

[90] The Attorney General's witness Lautner testified that petitioner's alleged preparations to set up an "underground" organization were made so that if it was outlawed as a political party it could,

Nevertheless, the Board found that petitioner's precautionary practices were engaged in for the purposes described in section 13(e)(7) on the ground that this conclusion "is inevitable when the secret practices are examined in the light of the whole record and all the surrounding circumstances under which they were and are performed" (R. 116). Clearly this conclusion was unfounded.

The court below held that the Board's finding as to the purpose of petitioner's practices was not supported by a preponderance of the evidence (R. 2151). The existence of the described purposes is an essential element of the "secret practices" criterion of section 13(e)(7). Accordingly, the holding of the court below invalidated the Board's entire finding under that criterion.

8. The "Allegiance" Criterion.

The Board's finding under section 13(e)(8) rested on four premises.

(a) The first of these was that petitioner advocates the violent overthrow of the United States government (R. 127).[91] nonetheless, continue carrying on "propaganda work, leaflet production and stuff like that," fight its way back to legality, and regain its constitutional status as a legal party (R. 919). The Attorney General's witness Matusow testified that caution in the use of telephones and other similar practices were adopted to safeguard against illegal wire-tapping and surveillance by the F.B.I. (R. 1025-6).

[91] This theory was an afterthought of the Board's, not shared by the Attorney General, who did not plead it in his petition or offer a proposed finding thereon. Moreover, in urging the admissibility of evidence as to the alleged advocacy of "force and violence," counsel for the Attorney General argued that it was relevant to the findings of section 2, and not to the allegiance test (e.g., Tr. 4153). The Board recognized that its theory was not shared by the Attorney General. For it said that "the evidence in the record which pertains to allegiance is broader in scope than [the Attorney General's] specific allegations" (R. 118). The Board's reliance on a matter not pleaded in the petition violated section 13(a), which provides that the Attorney General's petition shall state under verification

The Board derived this conclusion primarily from excerpts from the Communist Manifesto and the writings of Lenin and Stalin (R. 118-123). The finding thus flies in the face of Schneiderman v. United States, supra, in which the Court concluded, after a study of the same texts cited by the Board, that adherence to Marxism-Leninism is not inconsistent with attachment to the principles of the Constitution and being well-disposed toward the good order and happiness of the United States.

The Board also attempted to support its conclusion by reference to the testimony of a number of the Attorney General's informer witnesses (R. 121). However, the testimony of two of the witnesses on whom it relied was that Marixism-Leninism teaches that capitalism can be superseded peacefully, and a third gave no testimony on force and violence. A fourth witness (Matusow) contradicted himself and besides cannot, as the Board came to recognize (infra, p. 213), be credited. The most contemporary of the Attorney General's witnesses who testified on this subject was Lautner. Lautner's testimony, to which the Report does not refer, was that petitioner advocated a peaceful transition to socialism at the time of his expulsion from the Party in 1950. The Report also ignores oral and documentary evidence on this issue introduced by petitioner. (The evidence on this subject is discussed infra, pp. 205-07.)

The court below did not express concurrence in the Board's finding that petitioner advocates violent means to achieve its ultimate socialist objective. It noted (R. 2144) the testimony of petitioner's witness, Gates, that petitioner advocates a peaceful and constitutional road to socialism. It further took note (ibid.) of the declaration the facts on which he relies for relief. Moreover, as the Supreme Court held in Schneiderman v. United States, supra, at 160, in a civil action which "involves an important adjudication of status * * * the Government should be limited, as in a criminal proceeding, to the matters charged in its complaint."

in petitioner's constitution (A. G. Ex. 374) that, "The Communist Party upholds the achievements of American democracy and defends the United States Constitution and Bill of Rights against its reactionary enemies who would destroy democracy and popular liberties." Referring to this declaration, the court acknowledged (R. 2144) that it is "the established position of Communist leaders that American democracy has gone far in protecting the rights of minorities and of working people and in advancing the economic status of such people, and that in that respect American democracy receives the plaudits of those leaders."

The court nevertheless affirmed the finding of the Board on "allegiance" (R. 2151), in part because "the Party U.S.A. regards the Government of the United States as an imperialist government, and the ultimate essence of the Communist movement is the overthrow of imperialist governments." Obviously, however, advocacy by petitioner's leaders and members of the "overthrow" of imperialism and eventual establishment of socialism in this country by constitutional means does not evidence any lack of allegiance to the United States. Schneiderman v. United States, supra, at 136-46. Much less does such advocacy have any rational relation to the proof required by section 13(e)(8) that petitioner's leaders or members owe "obligations" to the Soviet Union superior to their allegiance to this country.

(b) The Board and the court below also relied on the concept of just and unjust wars which, they asserted, is a Communist doctrine that the Soviet Union must be supported in any war between that country and an imperialist power (R. 125-37, 2151). The Board's conclusion to this effect was based on the testimony of informer witnesses as to what was allegedly taught in certain Communist schools prior to the date of the Act (R. 125-27). The only official and authoritative statement of petitioner or its leaders which the Report cites on this question refutes its findings

(see A. G. Ex. 331; R. 127, 1632-4). That statement emphasized petitioner's belief in the possibility and desirability of the peaceful co-existence of capitalism and socialism. It added that if, despite the efforts of the peace forces of America and the world, "Wall Street" should initiate an aggressive war, petitioner would oppose it and would cooperate with all democratic forces "to bring such a war to a speedy conclusion on the basis of a democratic peace." Obviously, this position is not incompatible with full and faithful allegiance to the United States.

(c) The third basis for the Board's finding on allegiance consists of a hodge-podge of evidence, all relating to matters prior to the date of the Act.

The Report and the opinion below cite testimony that on several occasions some of petitioner's members pledged to be faithful to the teachings of Marxism-Leninism and to defend the Soviet Union. They likewise cite some references made to that country as "the worker's Fatherland." The Report refers to a resolution of the 1935 Congress of the Communist International and to petitioner's 1949 telegram of birthday greetings to Stalin, both of which recognized him as a great Communist leader (R. 122-25, 2151-52). These items on their face obviously do not demonstrate lack of allegiance to the United States. Their real import is discussed supra, p. 128-29.

In addition, the Report cites the testimony of a number of witnesses that they were taught that Communists owe allegiance to the Soviet Union or to the "democratic forces of the world" (R. 125-27). This testimony was all pre-Act, and represented merely the conclusory statements of informers (see, e.g., R. 974). Furthermore, the Report ignores the detailed testimony on this question of petitioner's witnesses, corroborated by official statements of its Chairman and General Secretary (R. 1235-41, 1282-83; C. P. Ex. 55, p. 3; C. P. Ex. 56, p. 3).

(d) The fourth basis of the Board's finding on allegiance consists of the only two post-Act matters on which it relied under this topic. These are: (1) an article by a leader of petitioner which criticized United States foreign policy as inciting war against the Soviet Union and urged support of what he termed "the peace policy of the Soviet Union" (R. 125-6; A. G. Ex. 477, R. 1773-5), and (2) the fact that petitioner opposed the Korean war as an unjust war of aggression by the United States and her allies (R. 127).

It is clear from the foregoing summary that the Board and the court below regarded opposition to the cold war, advocacy of socialism, and praise of the achievements of the Soviet Union and its leaders, as incompatible with allegiance to the United States and as evidence of "obligations" owed to the Soviet Union. Thus the Board and the court embraced what Professor Henry Steele Commager has called "the new loyalty" (Living Ideas in America, N. Y. 1951, p. 410):

> "What is the new loyalty? It is above all, conformity. It is the uncritical and unquestioning acceptance of America as it is—the political institutions, the social relationships, the economic practices. It rejects inquiry into the race question or socialized medicine, or public housing, or into the wisdom or validity of our foreign policy. It regards as particularly heinous any challenge to what is called the 'system of private enterprise,' identifying that system with Americanism. It abandons evolution, repudiates the once popular concept of progress and regards America as a finished product, perfect and complete."

B. The Factors Relied on by the Court Below.

The court below sustained the ultimate finding of the Board that petitioner is a Communist-action organization primarily on the basis of six factors. It characterized these as "underlying basic facts" that "are heavy in the scales" and "determine the final answer" (R. 2138). A review of those six factors demonstrates that they do not satisfy any of the criteria of section 13(e) and have no rational relation to the section 3(3) definition of a Communist-action organization.

These factors were:

(1) The fact that petitioner "presents no evidence of a repudiation of world Communist doctrines" subsequent to its disaffiliation from the Communist International in 1940 (R. 2138-42, 2147).

(2) The fact that petitioner calls itself the Communist Party of the United States. The court explained that "it is difficult for us to see why the Party would call itself the Communist Party of the U.S.A. if it were not in fact a part of the Communist movement in theory and program" (R. 2142).

(3) The fact that the reconstitution of the Communist Party in 1945 resulted from what was considered to be a prior departure from the principles of Marxism-Leninism (R. 2142-43).

(4) The fact that petitioner adheres to the "ultimate objective" of Marxism-Leninism, "a classless, stateless world" (R. 2143).

(5) The fact that "the Party's press follows closely world Communist views" (R. 2144-45, 2147).

(6) The fact that petitioner's views on the series of international questions testified about by Mosely (see supra, p. 137) were similar to the views of the Soviet Union (R. 2145-46).

As we have seen (supra, p. 155), the court below did not find that any of these factors involve the advocacy of violent or unconstitutional means for the attainment of petitioner's immediate or ultimate objectives.

Accordingly, the court held that petitioner is a Communist-action organization primarily because it believes in the principles of Communism, advocates a "classless stateless world," calls itself the "Communist Party of the United States," and has adopted views on certain questions of foreign policy which are similar to those of the Soviet Union. Plainly, none of these facts (all of which are undisputed) has any tendency to prove either the criteria of section 13(e) or the ultimate issue under section 3(3) that petitioner is "dominated and controlled" by the Soviet Union and operates to effectuate the seditious and criminal objectives which section 2 attributes to the world Communist movement.

II. The Order of the Board and the Decision Below Violate the Act Because They Rest on Alleged Conduct of the Petitioner Which, If It Ever Took Place, Had Been Discontinued Prior to Enactment of the Act.

The issue before the Board was the current character of petitioner, i.e., whether or not it was a Communist action organization at the time of the administrative proceeding, or, in any event, after September 23, 1950, the date of enactment of the Act.

Sections 13(g) and (h) make it the duty of the Board to determine whether a respondent in a proceeding before it "is" or "is not" a Communist action organization. Similarly, the definition of a Communist action organization in section 3(3) and the evidentiary tests of section 13(e) are all phrased in the present tense. Accordingly, the Act requires the Board to base its findings and order upon evidence of relevant current policies and practices of an organization and precludes it from basing them upon past policies and practices.

The express terms of the Act are re-enforced by the principle favoring the prospective construction of legislation and by the constitutional prohibition of ex post facto laws. White v. United States, 191 U. S. 545, 552; Shreve- port v. Cole, 129 U. S. 36; Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 277; Ex Parte Garland, 71 U. S. 333; Pierce v. Carskadan, 83 U. S. 284; Burgess v. Salmon, 97 U. S. 381.

The Board's order, therefore, must be supported by proof of relevant acts and practices of the petitioner subsequent to the date of the Act. Evidence of petitioner's conduct prior to that date is relevant, if at all, only to the extent that it serves to interpret or explain the significance and purpose of post-Act activities. The rule is "that testimony of prior or subsequent transactions, which for some reason are barred from forming the basis for a suit, may nevertheless be introduced if it tends to show the purpose or character of the particular transactions under inquiry." Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 705 (emphasis supplied).[92]

Since the Board's order must be based on post-Act conduct, the Board was required to show by its findings a basis for its order in post-Act evidence (sec. 13(g)). This the Board failed to do. Instead, the Report ranges over the entire thirty-three years of petitioner's history, indiscriminately commingling discussion of a few alleged contemporary practices with discussion of alleged episodes of the remote past. As the court below acknowledged (R. 2126), most of the Attorney General's evidence dealt with [92] That case indicates, however, that evidence of past transactions is not admissible even for this limited purpose, where the effect of the proceedings is not to regulate future practices but, as in this case, "to punish or to fasten liability on respondents for past conduct" (p. 706). In United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201, 231, the Second Circuit held in a criminal proceeding that evidence of conduct prior to the date of the statute creating the crime was admissible for the limited purpose stated in the Cement Institute case. However, it recognized that decisions in other circuits, in agreement with the dictum in Cement Institute, held that in criminal matters such testimony is not admissible for any purpose. Wolf v. United States, 259 F. 388, 393; Haywood v. United States, 263 F. 795. And see Dalton v. United States, 154 Fed. 461; Kammann v. United States, 259 Fed. 192.

the period prior to petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International in 1940, and the bulk of the Report is likewise devoted to this period.[93]

A minute examination of the 137 pages of the Board's printed Report is required to identify the post-Act evidence. When that task is done, it becomes apparent that the Report cites no evidence of post-Act conduct which can conceivably support a registration order, even under the irrational criteria of section 13(e).

We therefore proceed to examine the post-Act evidence relied on by the Board.

"Financial aid," "training," "reporting." There is not even a suggestion of post-Act evidence under these three standards. The Report acknowledges that there was no evidence of post-Act foreign financial aid (R. 88). Moreover, the only instance of such aid claimed after 1940 stems from a misrepresentation of hearsay testimony of the discredited Matusow (see supra, p. 145; infra, p. 207). The Report likewise acknowledges that there was no evidence of "instruction and training" subsequent to the outbreak of World War II (R. 92), and in fact the last instance cited by the Report occurred in 1936 (see supra, p. 146). Even [93] Nineteen of the Attorney General's witnesses had once held membership in the Communist Party. Fourteen of these had left or been expelled from the Party prior to the date of the Act, eight of them for periods ranging from five to twenty years before the Act (R. 134-35). None of the fourteen gave testimony as to the character or activities of the petitioner subsequent to the termination of his membership. The testimony of the five witnesses who had remained in the Party after the date of the Act (ibid.) was meagre and related almost exclusively to the period before that date. These witnesses had been rank and file members or minor local officers. Two of them had become virtually inactive in the Party prior to the date of the Act (R. 1034-35; Tr. 12360). Except for Harvey Matusow, all five produced little evidence on which the Board relied. The bulk of the documentary evidence relied upon by the Board consisted of Communist writings which likewise long antedated the Act, going back for a century. Contemporary writings are largely ignored, and, in any event, do not support the Board's propositions.

on the Board's perverted concept of what constitutes a "report," it found none after the date of the Act. And under any rational definition of "reporting," the Report cites nothing after 1935 (see supra, pp. 146-50). Moreover, as we have seen (ibid.), the court below struck the Board's finding on reporting as not supported by the evidence.

"Policies and Directives." The only post-Act evidence cited by the Report consists of the following irrelevancies:

a. Published statements of petitioner opposing the cold-war policies of the Truman Administration and advancing positions similar to those of the Soviet Union (and many non-Communists) on the rearming of Germany and Japan, atomic weapons, a cease-fire in Korea, etc. (R. 53-54).

b. Published statements of petitioner urging that the main direction of its work in the labor movement be towards workers in the A. F. of L. and C. I. O., inasmuch as the great majority of the organized workers are members of these organizations (R. 69).

c. Published statements of petitioner stressing the importance of enlisting the support of young people in the struggle for peace, outlining a program of immediate demands for young people, including opposition to extension of the draft, and commenting favorably on the position of young people in the Soviet Union (R. 71-72).

d. Published statements of petitioner that the Negro people and their struggle for first-class citizenship in this country are an important source of strength to the working class in its struggle against reaction, as well as for the ultimate establishment of socialism (R. 76-77).

e. Published statements of petitioner calling upon its members to examine their mistakes more closely and to strive for unity and discipline (R. 58, 63).

f. The facts that the Daily Worker receives and prints despatches from abroad, including Moscow, and stations a correspondent in Moscow, and that the newspaper of the Communist Information Bureau is purchased, read and discussed by some of petitioner's members.[94]

g. Completely discredited testimony of the F. B. I. informer and provocateur, Scarletto, concerning an alleged conversation in a local club meeting on the Korean war (R. 47; see infra, pp. 206-07), and the testimony of another informer witness that a speaker at a 1951 meeting had referred "to the necessity of infiltrating the different unions" (R. 70).

h. The fact that some of petitioner's present officials held positions in the Communist International prior to 1940, and visited and, in some cases, studied in the Soviet Union before 1940 (R. 20).

"Foreign Discipline." The post-Act evidence cited by the Board relates exclusively to irrelevant instances of internal discipline, as follows:

a. The provision of petitioner's constitution that "personal or political relations with enemies of the working class or the nation are incompatible with membership in the Communist Party" (R. 102).

b. A report made to petitioner's 1950 convention in which the speaker warned against factionalism and said that renegacy from Communism inevitably leads the renegade to hostility towards the Soviet Union (R. 101).

[94] The only other reasonably contemporaneous (though pre-Act) matters relied on by the Report to support its conclusion that the "Communist press" is a source of Soviet directives are that a May, 1950 article in Political Affairs, a publication of petitioner, quotes articles from Pravda and For a Lasting Peace, and that "some of the articles which are in evidence from Pravda contain specific references to the United States" (R. 63).

c. Petitioner's expulsion of one Warwick Tomkins (otherwise unidentified) for urging its members to distribute anti-Soviet leaflets (R. 103).

"Secret Practices." The Report contains scattered references to current practices, such as the reduction in the size of party branches and committees, the discontinuance of membership cards and lists, etc. However, all these matters were irrelevant since, as the court below held in setting aside the Board's finding under this criterion (R. 2151), the evidence failed to establish that petitioner's precautionary practices were adopted for either of the purposes specified in section 13(e)(7).

"Non-Deviation." The post-Act evidence cited by the Report is to the effect that petitioner's views opposing particular aspects of U. S. foreign policy were similar to those of the Soviet Union (R. 83-84). As we have shown (supra, pp. 137-44), this evidence is irrelevant since it does not establish "non-deviation" within the meaning of section 13(e)(2).

6. "Allegiance." The only post-Act evidence the Report cites is petitioner's opposition to the Korean war (R. 127) and an article published by petitioner which refers to the Soviet Union as the "leader of the world peace camp" and urges support of its peace policy (R. 125-126). The burden of the Board's findings on "allegiance" is its assertion that petitioner advocates the violent overthrow of our government. It cites no post-Act documentary evidence to that effect, and, in fact, all of the post-Act evidence establishes the contrary.[95] Moreover, as we have seen (supra, p. 155), [95] See infra, pp. 205-07. The Report makes the misleading statement that advocacy of violence was established by the testimony of witnesses whose membership "spanned the entire existence of the Party until January, 1951" (R. 121). However, as Appendix A of the Report reveals (R. 134-35), only one of these witnesses (Matusow) was a member subsequent to the date of the Act. None of the others was in a position to testify as to the post-Act advocacy or did so, and Matusow's testimony on the subject (aside from its unreliability) also related exclusively to the pre-Act period.

the court below did not endorse the Board's findings on this subject.

We have now reviewed every item of post-Act evidence referred to in the Report and relied upon by the Board. This review demonstrates that as to two of the eight statutory standards ("financial aid" and "training") the Report itself concedes that there is no post-Act evidence. As to a third ("reporting"), none of the evidence relied on by the Board relates to the post-Act period, and the Board's findings on the subject were stricken by the court below. The court likewise invalidated the Board's finding on secret practices. As to the remaining four standards, the post-Act evidence consists of a handful of scattered incidents and writings which are absurdly irrelevant and immaterial to the criteria of 13(e) as well as to the definition of 3(3).

The six factors which the court below regarded as determinative of the case against petitioner likewise do not involve relevant post-Act conduct. The only current matters to which they refer are petitioner's adherence to the ultimate Communist objective of a "classless, stateless world" and its advocacy of various international policies similar to those supported by the Soviet Union (R. 2138-47; see supra, p. 159).

It is obvious that the evidence as to petitioner's current activities relied upon by the Board and the court below cannot support a registration order. At most, it establishes that petitioner (1) is an American political party which subscribes to the principles of Communism, and (2) opposes cold war policies of the national administration and advocates certain policies on international questions which are similar to those of the Soviet Union and which it believes to be in the interest of world peace. Both of these facts have been repeatedly and publicly asserted by petitioner and were alleged in its answer (R. 165-66). They provide no evidence whatsoever that petitioner is a Communist-action organization, either within the section 3(3) definition or on the basis of the evidentiary standards of section 13(e). Since the "particular transactions under inquiry" (Cement Institute case, supra) cannot conceivably support a registration order, there is no present conduct to explain, and the pre-Act evidence utilized by the Board and the court below can serve no function and has no relevance.

The evidence as to current practices here is far weaker than that in United States v. Oregon Medical Society, 343 U. S. 326, where the Court reversed an anti-trust injunction, saying (at 334):

> "Striking the events prior to 1941 out of the Government's case, except for purposes of illustration or background information, little of substance is left. The case derived its coloration and support almost entirely from the abandoned practices."

An order against petitioner could not properly be issued, therefore, even if the only evidence in the proceeding had been that offered by the Attorney General. The fact is, however, that the petitioner's witnesses, Gates and Miss Flynn, testified that subsequent to the date of the Act and for the preceding years during which they served on petitioner's national committee,[96] petitioner (1) received no foreign directives, but formulated and carried out its policies independently; (2) arrived at its views and policies on the basis of its independent judgment of the needs and interests of the American people; (3) received no foreign financial aid; (4) did not send members or representatives abroad for instruction or training; (5) did not report to any foreign government or organization; (6) was not subject to and did not recognize any foreign disciplinary power; (7) exercised only such precautionary measures of concealment as it believed necessary to protect itself and its members against unjust persecution; and (8) owed allegiance only to the United States (R. 1211-27; 1235-41; 1282-91; Tr. 15031-32; 15795-96).

The Board dismissed this uncontradicted testimony with the bald statement that it did not establish the facts "to our satisfaction" (R. 130). It also said that "the record contains ample post-Act evidence which, when illuminated, supports our finding" (ibid.). But it never documented this untrue assertion by stating what this evidence was or how the scanty and irrelevant post-Act references in the Report could be or were "illuminated" into proof.

Apparently recognizing that the post-Act evidence could not support a registration order, the Board invoked a vague presumption of "continuance" (R. 130). However, it nowhere identified the pre-Act evidence on which it relied as the foundation of the presumption or the nature of the pre-Act conduct presumed to have continued.[97]

It is obvious, moreover, that continuance cannot be presumed in the face of petitioner's uncontradicted denials and evidence as to post-Act practices. "At most," a presumption of continuance "is but a rebuttable presumption which can not be weighed in the balance as against evidence." Sherman Inv. Co. v. United States, 199 F. 2d 504, 507. Furthermore, continuance cannot be presumed in the face of changed circumstances, such as petitioner's disaffiliation from, and the subsequent dissolution of, the Communist International. See Wigmore on Evidence, 3rd ed., v. 2, sec. 437. Nor can it be presumed that alleged conduct which was permissible at the time it occurred continued after passage of a statute which imposes sanctions for such conduct.[98]

[97] The absurdity of the Board's approach is illustrated by the fact that it found that foreign instruction and training stopped in 1936 (R. 90, 92), some 14 years before the Act. If there is an applicable "presumption," it should be one of discontinuance, not continuance.

[98] Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, Wolf v. United States, Haywood v. United States, Kammann v. United States, Dalton

The outer limit on the use of evidence of pre-Act conduct, as stated in Cement Institute, supra, is to "show the purpose or character of the particular transactions under inquiry." It cannot be used as a substitute for evidence of these transactions, i.e., of relevant post-Act conduct. Yet this is precisely what the Board did when, in violation of the Act and the ex post facto clause, it rested its order on a presumption.

The court below rejected, without discussion, our contention that the order of the Board must be supported by evidence of relevant practices engaged in by petitioner subsequent to the Act (R. 2140). Like the Board, it invoked a presumption of continuance. It found that "in the years prior to 1940 the Communist Party USA was dominated and controlled by the world Communist movement" because during that period petitioner was affiliated with the Communist International and bound by its decisions (R. 2138-40). It then held that petitioner's affiliation with the Communist International prior to 1940 was decisive of its present status as a Communist-action organization (R. 2141). The court's theory was that the past conduct of an organization is material to its present nature in the absence of "affirmative evidence of a departure from the established past" (R. 2140). It found that petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International and the latter's dissolution did not constitute such a "departure," stating:

> "To demonstrate a changed nature in the Party USA, some assertion of a change in substantive belief and program would have to be made" (R. 2141).
> "If the Communist Party USA does not adhere to the basic ultimate objective of Marxism-Leninism [i.e.,

---

v. United States, all supra. In United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201, the Court made clear the limited purpose for which it held pre-act evidence admissible, saying (at 231): "It is toto coelo a different question whether we are treating them [acts performed prior to the enactment of the law] as media concludendi or as the factum itself." Under the Board's presumption of continuance, however, the pre-Act conduct became "the factum itself."

'a classless, stateless world'], some vivid evidence to that effect should be readily available. . . . But this record contains no such evidence" (R. 2143).

The court's conclusion violates the terms of the Act and is completely illogical. The Act does not purport to require the registration of an organization which holds particular beliefs or opinions unless at least it is currently under foreign domination and control.

The court acknowledged, however, that the Communist International, from which petitioner disaffiliated in 1940, dissolved in 1943 and has not been replaced by any other instrumentality through which the "world Communist movement" could exercise control over petitioner. Whatever reasons may be claimed for petitioner's adherence to Communism prior to 1943, its subsequent adherence thereto has plainly been voluntary. The record contains no evidence of foreign coercion or enforced conformity, the court cites none, and the uncontradicted testimony of petitioner's witnesses is that there has been none (supra, p. 167).

The court's presumption of a continuance of foreign control from petitioner's failure to repudiate its opinions and beliefs is a complete non-sequitur. By it, the court, like the Board, permitted no escape to petitioner from its past affiliation with the defunct Communist International, except by suicide. It can avoid proscription under the Act as applied by the Board and the court only by repudiating its program and policies and ceasing to be a Communist Party in fact and even in name (see R. 2142). Such an application patently violates both the Act and the ex post facto clause.

III. The Board and the Court Below Applied the Act in Violation of the First Amendment.

It is apparent from the face of the Report that the findings of the Board were based primarily on the contents of books, periodicals and press statements setting forth views on social, economic, and political questions. Indeed, apart from a few matters that are either patently irrelevant or unfounded in fact, all of the post-Act evidence cited in the Report consists of publications containing expressions of petitioner's views (supra, pp. 162-66). Moreover, the six factors which the court below regarded as determinative in affirming the order of the Board relate exclusively to petitioner's views and policies (supra, p. 159).

In grounding and affirming the order on these expressions of opinion, the Board and the court magnified the vice inherent in the Act that it imposes sanctions for peaceable advocacy and association.

The Report and the opinion below do not, and on the record could not, suggest that petitioner advocates anything but peaceful, lawful, and democratic means to win the acceptance and adoption of its immediate objectives. Moreover, the Board expressly disclaimed any finding that these objectives are antagonistic to the interests of the American people, but stated (R. 81) that petitioner "was not permitted, and rightly so, to put in issue the merits of the views or policies of [petitioner], which views and policies were placed in evidence by the [Attorney General] to establish 'non-deviation.'"

Unquestionably the reliance of the Board and the court below on petitioner's views and advocacy concerning current international and domestic issues violates the First Amendment. This advocacy presents no danger of any evil against which the government may act. The Board and the court did not and could not find, for example, that petitioner's advocacy of a cease-fire in Korea, the seating of the People's Republic of China in the United Nations, the abandonment of the cold war policy, guarantees of full equality for the Negro people, the repeal of the Taft-Hartley, Smith, and McCarran Acts, and an increase in social security benefits (R. 53-54, 83-84, 77), presents any "danger" which Congress may suppress. Yet they based the registration death sentence in large part upon petitioner's advocacy of these views.

In short, the Board and the court below have added two additional exceptions to the clear and present danger exception to the First Amendment. These are that advocacy may be abridged, and indeed prohibited, if it is critical of the policies of the national administration or advances views on foreign affairs which are similar to those of the Soviet Union. The only "danger" that such advocacy presents is that the views in question may be adopted by the administration upon which they are urged or that the voters may be persuaded to elect a new administration which will adopt them. The only "danger," therefore, is the democratic process itself. As the Court said in Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359, 369:

> "The maintenance of the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes may be made by lawful means, an opportunity essential to the security of the republic, is a fundamental principle of our constitutional system."

It is this fundamental principle which the Act was designed to subvert and which its application by the Board and the court below would destroy.

The crass infringement of the First Amendment is not mitigated by the Board's assertions: (a) that petitioner's concededly legitimate political views were not arrived at independently but were the product of alleged foreign directives embodied in Marxist writings, and (b) that however meritorious these views may be, they were advocated with an evil motive. These assertions are unfounded and false (see, supra, pp. 120-37). But even if they were true, they could furnish no justification for abridging petitioner's rights of advocacy and association. Freedom of speech, press and assembly may not be denied because the doctrine taught is found to derive from a "bad" source or to be advocated for a "bad" motive. The "fundamental principle of our constitutional system," referred to in Stromberg, does not rest on so precarious a premise. Accordingly, the reliance by the Board and the court below on petitioner's peaceable advocacy on current issues requires a reversal.

The same thing is true of the reliance on petitioner's adherence to the principles of Marxism-Leninism. It is true that the Board asserted that Marxism-Leninism is a doctrine that advocates as an ultimate objective the violent overthrow of the government. This assertion is contrary to the evidence and to Schneiderman v. United States, supra, and was not accepted by the court below (see supra, p. 155, infra, pp. 205-07). But even if the Board's version of Marxist-Leninist teachings were correct, its reliance thereon to support the registration order would be unconstitutional. A showing that petitioner advocates the violent overthrow of the government would (if other constitutional prerequisites were met) at most authorize the prohibition of such advocacy. As we have shown, however, the registration order and the Act's sanctions are not so confined, since they abridge petitioner's right to speak and publish on any subject and to assemble for any purpose.

Furthermore, the Report is barren of findings which are prerequisite to the imposition of sanctions, even if confined to the advocacy of the violent overthrow of the government. The Court sustained the Smith Act convictions in the Dennis case, supra, only on the grounds that (1) the jury had found that the advocacy was accompanied by an intent to "overthrow the . . . the government of the United States by force and violence as speedily as circumstances permit," and (2) the trial judge had found that the advocacy, when coupled with this specific intent and under the current world conditions, created a clear and present danger. (See Dennis, at 499, 502, 510.) Neither the Board nor the court, however, made any such findings.

On the contrary, the thrust of the Report and the opinion below is that petitioner should be ordered to register merely because it believes in the principles of Communism. The Board relied on the content of Marxist literature to support its conclusion that those who agree with its precepts are, ipso facto, seditious foreign agents. For example, it stated that "by the acceptance of and adherence to Marxism-Leninism [petitioner], subjects itself to the authority of the Soviet Union" (R. 79). The court below went even further, holding (R. 2148) that petitioner's belief in a "stateless, classless world" is a determinative factor in establishing that it is a Communist-action organization. Thus the Board imposed and the court affirmed the registration order on the basis of mere belief. This is patently unconstitutional.

In American Communications Associations v. Douds, 339 U. S. 482, the six Justices who participated in the decision divided evenly as to the validity of that portion of section 9(h) of the Taft-Hartley Act which requires affidavits denying belief in the forcible overthrow of the government.[100] The three Justices who sustained the belief portion of the affidavit recognized that Congress could not forbid or punish the holding of any belief and upheld this provision of section 9(h) on the ground that the "sole effect of the statute upon one who believes in overthrow of the government by force and violence—and does not deny his belief—is that he may be forced to relinquish his position as a union leader" (at 408). "We have noted," they stated, "that the distinction is one of degree" (at 409).

Thus even by the test of the latter three Justices a registration order under the present Act cannot be predicated on belief. For the sanctions and disabilities which the order entails are so comprehensive and severe, and are fortified by such extravagant criminal penalties, that they obviously surpass any permissible "distinction of degree."

[100] In Osman v. Douds, 339 U. S. 846, the Court divided four-four on the validity of the belief portion of the affidavits.

IV. The Court Below, Having Invalidated Key Findings of the Board, Erred in Not Remanding the Case for Administrative Redetermination.

As we have seen (supra, pp. 120-58), the Board rested its decision that petitioner is a Communist-action organization on findings adverse to petitioner under each of the eight criteria of Section 13(e). Since the Board's ultimate conclusion was based on the totality of these eight findings, it cannot be said that the same conclusion would have been reached if any of the findings had been omitted or had been to the contrary effect.[101]

The court below struck the finding of the Board under the "reporting" criterion of section 13(e)(5) (see supra, p. 149). It also set aside the Board's finding that the purpose of petitioner's so-called "secret practices" was to promote its objectives and to conceal Soviet control. It thereby invalidated the Board's entire finding under section 13(e)(7). (See supra, p. 154). Accordingly, the premises on which the Board acted do not support its ultimate conclusion and order, since it based its order on the sum of eight findings, not on six.

Furthermore, the court below held that the "non-deviation" criterion of section 13(e)(2) had no relevance to the "objectives" component of the section 3(3) definition. The Board, however, used its finding on "non-deviation" to support its conclusion on that component of the definition, as well as on the foreign control component. (See supra, p. 142.) In this respect as well, therefore, it is clear that the Board based its ultimate conclusion and order on a premise held by the court to be erroneous.

[101] We have shown that the Board was a biased tribunal which would inevitably have found against the petitioner no matter what the state of the record. But if the Court accepts this contention, a reversal is required on the ground that petitioner did not have a fair hearing.

Section 14 of the Act permits affirmance of a registration order only if the findings of the Board are supported by a preponderance of the evidence. The court below held that two of the key findings were not so supported and that a third was given an erroneous application. Therefore it could not validly affirm the Board's order, but should have remanded the case for administrative redetermination in the light of the court's action.

A remand was also required by the familiar principle that an administrative order cannot be sustained unless the grounds on which the agency predicated it are valid. In violation of this principle, the court below acted as though it were the administrative agency and the Board its trial examiner.

The decision below contravenes National Labor Relations Board v. Virginia Electric & Power Co., 314 U. S. 469. There the Court remanded an administrative order because the agency's ultimate conclusion rested on findings which had insufficient evidentiary support. The Court recognized that the agency could validly have reached the same ultimate conclusion by making other findings supportable by the record before it. Nevertheless it remanded the case so that the agency could decide anew on the existing record after discarding the invalid findings.

The decision below is also contrary to S.E.C. v. Chenery Corp., 318 U. S. 80, which remanded an administrative proceeding because the order could not be sustained on the bases on which the agency acted, although it might have been valid if the agency had applied correct premises. The Court stated:

> "The grounds upon which an administrative order must be judged are those upon which the record discloses that its action was based" (at 87).
> "The Commission's action cannot be upheld merely because findings might have been made and considerations disclosed which would justify its order as an appropriate safeguard for the interests protected by the Act" (at 94).

> "We merely hold that an administrative order cannot be upheld unless the grounds upon which the agency acted in exercising its powers were those upon which its action can be sustained" (at 95).

See also, I.C.C. v. C.B. & Q.R.R., 186 U. S. 320, 341; Colorado Wyoming Gas Co. v. F.P.C., 324 U. S. 626, 634; Atchison Ry. v. United States, 295 U. S. 193, 201-03.[102]

As stated in Federal Power Commission v. Idaho Power Co., 344 U. S. 17, 20:

> "* * * the function of the reviewing court ends when an error of law is laid bare. At that point, the matter once more goes to the Commission for reconsideration."

Here the court below "laid bare" three major errors of law. Accordingly, its decision must be reversed so that the order of the Board may be vacated and the case remanded for agency redetermination.

The necessity for this course is underscored by the fact that of the five findings which survived, two had little if any weight against petitioner. As we have seen, the Board itself found that practices involving "financial aid" and "instruction and training" were not currently engaged in by petitioner (R. 88, 92; supra, p. 162), and it advised the court below that it "could not have placed great reliance" on the "financial aid" criterion (supra, p. 145).[103] In contrast, it is clear from the Report that the Board relied heavily on two of the invalidated findings. It devotes more pages to "secret practices" than to any other criterion with the exception of "policies and directives" (R. 105-117). And the court below characterized the evidence on "nondeviation" as "one of the chief items of evidence in the case" (R. 2148).

[102] The action of the court below is also in conflict with its own decisions. Democrat Printing Co. v. F.C.C., 202 F. 2nd 298; Mississippi River Fuel Corp. v. F.P.C., 163 F. 2d 433, 449.

[103] Moreover, the court below recognized that the "financial aid" and "instruction and training" criteria had no great materiality to the ultimate issue (R. 2123).

PART THREE

PETITIONER DID NOT RECEIVE A FAIR HEARING BEFORE A VALIDLY CONSTITUTED TRIBUNAL.

I. The Petitioner Was Denied a Fair Hearing Because the Members of the Board Were Subjected to Extra-Legal Pressures to Decide Against It and Were Personally Biased and Prejudiced Against It. Two Board Members Should Have Been Disqualified on Affidavits of Bias and Prejudice.

We have shown (supra, p. 70) that the Act itself made a fair hearing of this case impossible since a decision in petitioner's favor would have reversed the legislative verdict of guilt, repealed the Act by administrative action, and terminated the jobs and salaries of the Board members. These irresistible pressures were reinforced by extra-legal measures which subjected the unconfirmed Board appointees to policing by the Senate Judiciary Committee, whose then chairman, Senator McCarran, was both the nominal author of the Act and in effective control of the confirmation of appointments to the Board. Moreover, the two Board members who composed the panel during most of the hearing [104] and who wrote the recommended decision clearly evinced their personal bias and prejudice against the petitioner.

A. The Extra-Legal Pressures on the Board Members.

The President named the five original members of the Board by so-called recess appointments on October 23, 1950. He submitted their nominations to the Senate on November 27, 1950 and again on February 12, 1951. (First Annual [104] The hearing panel was originally composed of three Board members, but the appointment of the third member lapsed because of non-confirmation during the course of the hearing, and he was not replaced (R. 1).

Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5). However, the Senate Judiciary Committee took no action on these nominations until July 30, 1951, when it reported favorably on Board members Brown and McHale (both members of the hearing panel) and Coddaire, but took no action on Board member LaFollette, the third member and chairman of the panel, and the acting chairman of the Board.[105] The three nominees who were favorably reported were confirmed by the Senate ten days later. (Second Annual Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5.) The LaFollette nomination died in committee with the adjournment of the Eighty-Second Congress on October 20, 1951, at which time Mr. LaFollette ceased to serve (R. 1).

Accordingly, for many months during the pendency of the administrative proceeding,[106] the tenure of the Board members was subject to the pleasure of the Senate Judiciary Committee, whose chairman had the power to block confirmation if their conduct of the proceeding did not conform to his wishes. It was this committee which stated in its report on the legislation that "there is incontrovertible evidence of the fact that the Communist Party of the United States" has all of the characteristics of a Communist-action organization (supra, p. 45).

The pressures on the Board members generated by this situation were recognized by the Board's first chairman, Seth W. Richardson. One week before the taking of testimony in this proceeding began, Mr. Richardson publicly admitted that the Board's handling of the case had been "psychologically complicated" by the failure of the Senate to confirm the members of the Board. N. Y. Times, April 16, 1951, p. 25. The existence of these pressures was also the subject of public comment. The Washington Post stated in an editorial:

[105] The fifth original member of the Board and its first chairman, Mr. Seth W. Richardson, resigned on June 6, 1951, because of his health (First Annual Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5).

[106] The petition was filed on November 22, 1950, and after pre hearing motions were disposed of, the panel began to hear testimony on April 23, 1951 (R. 1).

> "Unhappily, however, there is a great deal of force to the contention put forward by Vito Marcantonio that 'this board sits in jeopardy, and if at any time it takes a view contrary to that of the chairman of the Senate committee (Senator Pat McCarran) which is to pass on its nominations the members may never be confirmed in the positions to which they have been appointed' * * *. The Board entirely lacks the independence necessary to its quasi-judicial function." (Quoted in Frantz, Tooling Up for Mass Repression, The Nation, Dec. 12, 1953, p. 496.)

See also N. Y. Times, April 15, 1951, p. 1.

The gun of non-confirmation which the Senate Judiciary Committee thus held at the heads of the Board members was loaded with live ammunition. This is established by the evidence developed at the hearing and confirmed by the political execution of Board member LaFollette.

Gitlow, the first witness called by the Attorney General, was in frequent contact with one Benjamin Mandel during his appearance on the witness stand. Mandel was then employed by the Senate Subcommittee on Internal Security, a sub-committee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and, like the latter, under the chairmanship of Senator McCarran (R. 282, 295-97). The subjects discussed by the witness and Senator McCarran's employee were also established. Gitlow testified, "I discussed the conduct of this case, I discussed the attorneys in the case, I discussed the members of the panel" (R. 295).

Two of the Attorney General's other witnesses, Kornfeder and Crouch, were likewise shown to have been in contact with Mandel, the former almost daily throughout his appearance as a witness (R. 347-49; Tr. 3536-55, 5802-03). The panel, however, excluded cross-examination designed to show that Kornfeder, like Gitlow, discussed the Board members' conduct with Mandel (R. 349).

Nevertheless, the panel members were fully aware from Gitlow's express admission and from the clear implications of the testimony of Crouch and Kornfeder, that their conduct of the proceeding was under surveillance by the chairman of the Senate Committee which, on the one hand, had power to block their confirmation and, on the other hand, had flatly stated that incontrovertible evidence proved petitioner to be a Communist-action organization. The panel chairman bluntly stated his appreciation of the existence and effect of this intolerable situation:

> "Mr. LaFollette: So that my own thinking may be clear for everybody to know, I feel pretty much the same way about this witness discussing my conduct in the hearing room with Mr. Mandel, under the circumstances, as I would if I were a nisi prius judge in an elective office, and a political boss had the right to control my nomination or renomination. I would resent it very much. I don't know that it necessarily proves, of itself, that there was an attempt by this device to intimidate me" (R. 297).[107]

Another revealing incident occurred when Kornfeder (who as already noted, was in almost daily contact with Mandel) evidenced such an arrogant and contemptuous attitude toward Mr. LaFollette that the latter was impelled to surrender the panel chairmanship to Board member (later chairman) Brown. In doing so, Mr. LaFollette stated in part (R. 345-46):

> "In this proceeding, also factually, we recognize, or I do, that there is great public support for anything which the [Attorney General] here proposes, which makes it impossible for me, notwithstanding the stalwart support which I received from my colleague, Dr.

[107] At the inception of the hearing and again after this incident, petitioner moved to adjourn the hearing until the Senate had confirmed the appointments of the Board members (R. 240, 293-95). Both motions were denied (R. 249, 301).

McHale, yesterday, to feel that I can conduct these hearings in a way which will be consistent with orderly procedure.

"I do not believe that I will be able to exercise any control over any witnesses submitted by the [Attorney General] and I think if I cease to exercise the prerogative of presiding we will have a much more orderly process and there will be no delays by any statements made by the presiding officer, which seems to be so offensive." [108]

Kornfeder immediately reported this incident to Senator McCarran's agent, Mandel (R. 348). A few days later, the Board members were "summoned to Capitol Hill * * * for an un-announced 'get acquainted' meeting" with two members of Senator McCarran's Internal Security Sub-Committee. N. Y. Times, June 14, 1951, p. 9.

It is obvious that Mr. LaFollette's nomination was killed in committee at least in part as a reprisal for his resistance to the Committee's pressure upon him. The other two members of the panel were confirmed after they had meekly accepted the surveillance and otherwise demonstrated that they could be implicitly trusted to rubber stamp the Act's verdict against petitioner. Indeed, Mr. LaFollette supplied Board member Brown with a weighty credential to Senator McCarran. In his statement surrendering the panel chairmanship from which we have already quoted, Mr. LaFollette referred to his colleague in the following words (R. 346):

"Also, we will have a speedier hearing, I am sure because the Panel Member, Mr. Brown, whom I have asked to preside from now on, has already evidenced the remarkable capacity to make speedy and immediate rulings upon all objections presented to this Panel.

[108] Mr. LaFollette's resignation was set aside by Mr. Richardson, then chairman of the Board (R. 346-7), and LaFollette continued to chair the panel until his appointment terminated upon the adjournment of Congress.

"The fact that they almost uniformly amount to a sustaining of any position taken by the [Attorney General] and a rejection of any position taken by the [petitioner] is purely coincidental, I am sure."

B. The Personal Bias and Prejudice of the Members of the Board.

The two members of the panel (Brown and McHale) whose conduct of the hearing commended them to the Senate Judiciary Committee subsequently demonstrated their personal bias and prejudice against petitioner and a gross disregard for their function as quasi-judicial officers. Their conduct was made the subject of affidavits of bias and prejudice (R. 187-190, 196-199), which the Board erroneously denied (R. 190, 209).

During the course of the hearing, Dr. McHale made a speech before the Women's National Democratic Club in which she discussed the proceeding at some length. She referred to one of the issues of fact which had arisen in connection with the "non-deviation" criterion and to the character of the world Communist movement, and expressed a pre-judgment on both (R. 193-96, 187-90). She indicated her view that the hearing was merely a formality by likening the petitioner to the rabbit in the aphorism, "as an old recipe for rabbit stew goes, we must first catch the rabbit" (R. 196).

Immediately after the issuance of the panel's recommended decision and while the proceeding was pending on review before the full Board, Chairman Brown and the Board's general counsel appeared on a radio and television forum sponsored by Georgetown University and devoted to a discussion of this case from an anti-Communist point of view. The chairman and the general counsel commented on the evidence, expressed self-gratulatory delight with the recommended decision, and stated their conviction that petitioner is a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act. In referring to the Act's definition of Communist-front organizations, Mr. Brown stated that they are organizations controlled by the Communist Party, thereby demonstrating his awareness of and agreement with the Act's prejudgment (R. 197-98, 206-08).

Accordingly, the provisions of the Act, the pressures and actions of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and the personal bias and prejudice of the Board members, combined to make a fair hearing impossible. External pressures and personal prejudice wrote the order against petitioner, without regard to law or fact.

The record here does not require the court to speculate "on the effect of subconscious psychological pressures" on the members of the Board. Cf. Shaughnessy v. Accardi, 349 U. S. 280, 283. All of the factors which the Court there held would vitiate the decision of an administrative agency were present here. The Board members were, of course, aware of the terms of the Act, of petitioner's condemnation as a Communist-action organization in the report of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and of the status of their appointments before that Committee. They were "directly or indirectly approached" (ibid.) by the Senate Committee at the "get acquainted meeting" and through Mandel. Finally, both the chairman of the Board and the chairman of the hearing panel made statements acknowledging that they were affected by these pressures. It is therefore clear from Accardi and the other authorities cited (supra, pp. 70-71) that petitioner was denied due process.

Furthermore, the order must be set aside on the independent ground of the refusal of the Board to disqualify Dr. McHale and Mr. Brown. Section 7(a) of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. 1006(a)), made applicable by section 16 of the Act, requires disqualification of a hearing officer or an officer participating in the decision, on the basis of a "sufficient affidavit of personal bias or disqualification." The affidavits of bias and prejudice filed by petitioner on the basis of McHale's speech and Brown's radio-television performance made a sufficient showing against both these Board members, the test being whether the allegations "give fair support to the charge of a bent of mind that may prevent or impede impartiality of judgment." Berger v. United States, 255 U. S. 22, 33-34.

II. The Original Appointments to the Board Violated the Constitution. The Court Below Should Have Set Aside the Board's Order Because the Acts of the Board Members Prior to Senate Confirmation of Their Appointments Were Invalid.

The pertinent facts with reference to the appointments of the Board members are the following: The Act was passed by Congress over the President's veto on September 23, 1950. Later the same day, Congress adjourned pursuant to a concurrent resolution providing that it should reconvene on November 27, 1950 (96 Cong. Rec. 15895). On October 23, 1950, the President issued "recess" appointments to five persons as members of the Board. On November 27, 1950, upon the reconvening of Congress, the President transmitted the nominations of these persons to the Senate for its advice and consent. On January 2, 1951, the 81st Congress adjourned sine die without having acted on the nominations. The nominations were again submitted to the Senate of the 82nd Congress on February 12, 1951. (First Annual Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5.) The Senate took no action on these nominations until August 9, 1951 when it confirmed three of the appointees. (Second Annual Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5.)

Article 2, sec. 2, cl. 3 of the Constitution provides:

> "The President shall have Power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate by granting Commissions which shall expire at the end of their next Session."

A. The Original Appointments Were Invalid Because No Vacancies Happened During the Recess.

The offices of Board members could not be filled by recess appointments because they came into being with the passage of the Act on September 23, 1950.

"Vacancies" do not "happen" in the constitutional sense in offices which are newly created by law. In 1813 and again in 1822, the Senate construed Article 2, sec. 2, cl. 3 to refer to vacancies occurring by reason of death, resignation, promotion or removal, and to exclude those which result from the creation of a new office. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, sec. 1559.

Even if "vacancies happened" on the Board upon the passage of the Act, they did not happen "during the Recess of the Senate," but while the Senate was still in session on September 23, 1950.

The only case which passed on the validity of a recess appointment to a newly created office, held that the President had no power to make such an appointment because no vacancy happened, and, in any event, did not happen during the Recess of the Senate. Schenck v. Peay, 21 Fed. Cas. 672. Cf. People v. Forquer, 1 Ill. 104.[109]

In the Schenck case, the court pointed out (at 674-675) that Webster defines the word "happen" as: "'First, To come by chance; to come without previous expectation. Second. To take place; to occur'." It held that an office newly created by Congress does not "happen" to become vacant within the meaning of the first definition of that term. Nor, if the second definition is applied, does the vacancy "occur" during the recess. Furthermore, the court [109] The same question was raised in Ex Parte Ward, 173 U. S. 452, in an attack by habeas corpus on the appointment of the sentencing judge. The Court disposed of the case without discussing the merits on the ground that the judge's title to office was not subject to collateral attack.

pointed out (ibid.) that in defining the term "vacant," Webster states that "'vacancy adds the idea of a thing having been previously filled'." Thus the use of the term "vacancy" also negatives the applicability of the clause to the case of a newly created office.[110]

In accord with the Schenck case and the expressions of the Senate in 1813 and 1822, all of the leading commentators accept the view that offices newly created while the Senate is in session may not be filled during the recess. Story, loc. cit.; Cooley, General Principles of Constitutional Law, p. 104; Pomeroy, An Introduction to Constitutional Law, p. 436; 2 Tucker, The Constitution, p. 407; Watson, On the Constitution, p. 988; Morganston, The Appointing and Removal Power of the President of the United States, Sen. Doc. 172, 70th Cong., 2 Sess., p. 136. Two opinions of Attorney Generals are to the same effect: 2 Ops. A. G. 332; 4 Ops. A. G. 362. Three opinions of Attorney Generals are to the contrary: 12 Ops. A. G. 455; 18 Ops. A. G. 28; 19 Ops. A. G. 261.[111]

B. The Appointments Were Invalid Because They Were Not Made "During the Recess."

If the adjournment of the Senate from September 23 to November 27, 1950 was not "the Recess," then clearly the President had no power to make the appointments on October 23, 1950.

[110] The cases are evenly divided even as to the power of the President to make a recess appointment to a previously existing office where the vacancy (caused by death, resignation or removal) occurred while the Senate was in session. Cf. Case of the District Attorney, 7 Fed. Cas. 731 with In re Farrow, 3 Fed. 112, the only cases on the point.

[111] Legislative acquiescence in the position of the Schenck case, the text writers, and the first two Attorney General's opinions cited above, is indicated by the fact that in 1928 a monograph reiterating this position was by Senate Resolution ordered printed as a Senate document. Morganston, op. cit., p. iii.

In 23 Ops. A. G. 599, Attorney General Knox in a carefully reasoned opinion held that the term "the Recess," as used in Article 2, refers to the sine die recess between the annual sessions of Congress or between an annual and an extraordinary session, as distinguished from an "adjournment" under Article 1, sec. 5, cl. 4, which provides for a temporary suspension of business during a session. He concluded that the interval between an adjournment of the Congress to a day certain and its next sitting date was not "the Recess" in the constitutional sense. Hence, he held, the President had no appointive power for vacancies which happen during that period. Attorney General Dougherty rendered a contrary, but wholly unreasoned, opinion. 33 Ops. A. G. 20. Also contrary to the Knox holding are Case of the District Attorney, supra, and a dictum in Gould v. United States, 19 Ct. Clm. 593.

We submit that the Knox opinion correctly states the law and that the original appointments to the Board were invalid because they were not to offices which were vacant "during the Recess."

C. If the Appointments Were Valid When Made, They Expired on January 2, 1951.

Article 2 provides that appointments made during the recess of the Senate "shall expire at the end of their next session." If, contrary to our contention, the adjournment of Congress from September 23 to November 27, 1950, was "the Recess," then November 27 must have been the beginning of its "next session." For clearly, "the Recess" is the interval between sessions. If that be the case, however, the appointments expired on January 2, 1951 when the "next session" ended with the sine die adjournment of Congress.

Accordingly, acceptance of the proposition that the appointments were made during a recess compels the conclusion that they expired on January 2, 1951. The Case of the District Attorney, supra, which is the lone judicial authority for the view that a period of adjournment to a day certain is a recess, held that the reconvening of the Senate after such an adjournment is its "next session." Accordingly the only case which supports the validity of the original appointments, supplies authority for the proposition that they expired on January 2, 1951.

D. The Invalidity or Expiration of the Original Appointments Requires That the Order of the Board Be Set Aside.

It follows from the foregoing that for many months during the pendency of this proceeding, when preliminary motions were decided adversely to petitioner and evidence was taken, there was no lawfully constituted Board in existence. The confirmation of the nominations of a majority of the appointees on August 9, 1951, did not, of course, cure the invalidity of the original appointments, but simply gave them title to office from the date of confirmation. United States v. Kirkpatrick, 6 U.S. 244, 248. Thus the acts and rulings of the purported members of the Board prior to August 9, 1951 (or, at all events, between January 2 and August 9, 1951) were those of usurpers.

Petitioner has standing to assert the invalidity of the appointments in this proceeding. The rule that the validity of the appointment of a de facto officer is not subject to collateral attack, as upon a petition for habeas corpus,[112] has no application in this case, where the attack is direct. Moreover, petitioner raised this issue and sought to have it adjudicated at the inception of the proceeding. It first moved before the Board to quash the proceedings on the ground that the appointments of the Board members were invalid (Tr. 61). The Board denied this motion on the grounds that it was without authority to decide constitutional questions and that the issue should await determination upon judicial review of the Board's order (Tr. 113).

Petitioner thereupon sued in the District Court to enjoin further proceedings before the Board upon the ground, among others, that there was no lawfully constituted Board in existence. Communist Party of the United States of America v. McGrath, 96 F. Supp. 47, 48. In denying petitioner's motion for a preliminary injunction, the court said (ibid, p. 47):

> "Furthermore, the constitutional questions raised by the plaintiffs can be saved before the Board and determined upon review by the United States Court of Appeals pursuant to the direction of Congress for judicial review of the Board's actions under the controlling statute.[113]

Accordingly, it appears not only that petitioner made timely objection to the illegal composition of the Board but that the statutory court refused to consider the merits of that objection upon the ground that the question should be saved for review by the Court of Appeals.

The court below, however, by-passed consideration of the merits of the constitutional question raised by petitioner. It did so on the grounds (1) that the effect of any invalidity in the appointments was "minimal" because most of the hearing occurred after confirmation of the appointees, and (2) that in any event the appointees can be regarded as trial examiners (R. 2125).

However, the effect of the invalidity of the appointments cannot be measured by the relative amount of testimony taken before and after confirmation. The court below disregarded the fact that key pre-trial motions were denied by the usurpers (Tr. 113-117), who also made precedent setting rulings on the evidence at the inception of the hearing.

[113] This Court denied petitioner's application for a stay of proceedings before the Board pending an appeal from the order of the statutory court. Communist Party of the United States v. McGrath, 340 U. S. 950. Thereafter, the proceeding was dismissed (R. 2, ftn. 2).

The court's suggestion that the unconfirmed appointees can be regarded as trial examiners is palpably untenable, if only because there was no compliance with the provisions for the appointment, tenure, compensation and assignment of examiners, prescribed by section 11 of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U. S. C. 1010), made applicable to this proceeding by section 16 of the Act.

The effect of the judicial rulings that petitioner's initial challenge of the appointments was premature and its renewed challenge was tardy is to deprive it and other litigants of any remedy against usurpations of administrative office. We submit that the constitutional objection to the appointments to the Board is meritorious, was appropriately raised in this proceeding, and requires a reversal of the decision below.

PART FOUR

THE BOARD'S FINDINGS ARE NOT SUPPORTED BY A PREPONDERANCE OF THE EVIDENCE. MOREOVER, THE COURT BELOW ERRONEOUSLY DENIED PETITIONER'S MOTION TO ADDUCE ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE

I. It Appears From the Face of the Report and the Decision Below That the Findings of the Board Are Not Supported by a Preponderance of the Evidence.

Under section 14(a), the Board's order must be set aside if the findings of the Board are not supported by a preponderance of the evidence. The Report and the opinion below show on their face that this evidentiary burden was not met for the following reasons:

(1) There is no relevant post-Act evidence to support either the ultimate finding under section 3(3) or the findings under section 13(e) (see supra, p. 160).

(2) The court below set aside the Board's findings under two of the criteria of section 13(e) as not supported by the evidence, and under its decision the Board erred in the application of a third criterion (supra, p. 175). Furthermore, petitioner was entitled to favorable findings under three of the 13(e) criteria on which the Board made adverse findings (supra, pp. 144-49).

(3) The findings are based on erroneous interpretations and applications of the criteria of 13(e), and there is no relevant evidence to support findings adverse to petitioner under the criteria as correctly construed (supra, pp. 120-58).

(4) The evidence relied on by the Board and the court below does not support the finding that there is a world Communist movement as defined by section 2 (see infra, pp. 193-99).

(5) The six "basic facts" on which the court below sustained the finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization are irrelevant to both the section 3(3) definition and the 13(e) criteria (supra, pp. 158-60).

(6) The Board's ultimate conclusion rested solely on its findings under section 13(e). But the criteria of this section, as the court below held, have no relevance to the objectives element of the 3(3) definition (supra, p. 46). Hence the Board's ultimate finding as to this component of the definition is not supported either by the evidence or its subsidiary findings.

For each one of these reasons, the decision below must be reversed on the ground that it and the Report show on their face that the registration order lacks evidentiary basis.

II. The Board's Finding With Reference to a World Communist Movement, If Authorized by the Act, Is Not Supported by the Evidence.

We have already seen (supra, p. 42) that the court below held that the findings of section 2 of the Act with reference to the existence and nature of a world Communist movement are conclusive upon the Board and the courts.[114] Nevertheless, the court reviewed and sustained the finding of the Board that, on the evidence, "there exists a world Communist movement substantially as described in section 2 of the Act" (R. 2138).

[114] The Board straddled the question. It first stated (R. 4) that it was "desirable" to make findings as to the world Communist movement. Then it stated (R. 130) that it was unnecessary to decide whether such findings are required by the Act inasmuch as it had already made them. In its brief below (pp. 61-62), the Board acknowledged that the findings of section 2 are conclusive.

If, as we and the court below interpret the Act, the matter is not one for administrative adjudication, then the Act is palpably unconstitutional as fiat legislation (supra, p. 56) On the other hand, if this Court decides that the matter is one for determination by the Board, the decision below must be reversed because the evidence fails to establish the existence of a world Communist movement having the charateristics described in section 2.

Section 2 describes a world Communist movement in terms of (1) its organizational form, (2) the source of its direction and control, (3) its objectives, and (4) the means it employs to achieve these objectives. The record is bare of evidence of the existence of a world Communist movement having any of the four characteristics described in section 2.

Organizational form. Section 2 finds that the world Communist movement referred to therein operates "through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization" (sec. 2(1)), of which the Communist parties of various countries are "sections" (sec. 2(5)) and "affiliated constituent elements" (sec. 2(8)).

The organizational form of the Communist International corresponded to the foregoing description. However, as the Board and the court below acknowledged, that organization was dissolved in 1943 (R. 7, 2137). It has not been succeeded by any organization that corresponds to the Act's description. The Communist Information Bureau, referred to in the Report (R. 7), plainly is not such an organization. As the Board itself found (R. 17), "The exact nature and characteristics of the Communist Information Bureau are not precisely defined on the Record." Moreover, the record discloses that the Bureau is not an organization of the character described in section 2.

First, as the Report acknowledges (R. 17), the Bureau is not a "world-wide organization," but is confined to the Communist parties of eight European countries (R. 1592). The uncontradicted evidence shows that petitioner has neither membership in it nor dealings with it (supra, p. 121). Further, the Record demonstrates that the Bureau is not a centralized organization of which the members (in the words of section 2) are "sections," under the organization's "direction and control." As is shown by the uncontradicted evidence introduced by the Attorney General and relied upon by the Report, the purpose of the Bureau is to provide a medium for "mutual consultation and voluntary co-ordination of action" among the member parties (R. 7). Finally, the testimony of the Attorney General's own witness, Lautner (which the Report ignores), destroys the Board's conclusion. He testified that shortly after the formation of the Bureau, one of petitioner's top officers informed a meeting of petitioner's functionaries that the purpose of the Bureau was not to reconstitute the Communist International, but merely to provide a means for the exchange of experiences and opinions by member parties (R. 937-938, 971).

Direction and control. Section 2(4) finds that the direction and control of the world movement described therein is vested in "the Communist dictatorship of a foreign country."

There can, of course, be no basis for a finding that a world Communist organization presupposed by section 2 is controlled by the Soviet Union, since the evidence negatives the existence of such an organization. Moreover, the record contains no evidence that the Soviet Union or its Communist Party controls the various Communist Parties of the world. On the contrary, the evidence cited by the Board (R. 7), establishes only that the relations of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the other affiliates of the Communist Information Bureau are voluntary and consultative.

Objectives. Section 2(2) and (3) describes the objective of the world Communist movement as the establishment of "totalitarian dictatorships," which it defines as one-party systems of government which suppress all opposition, deny fundamental rights and liberties (including freedom of speech, press, assembly and religion), and maintain control through fear, terrorism and brutality.

Concededly, the Communist Party of each country where capitalism prevails has as its ultimate objective the attainment of state power by the working class and its supporters in that country. The term "dictatorship of the proletariat"—the rule of the working class—was originated by Marx to describe the character of the state under socialism (Tr. 15207-15208; 15513-15515, 16309-16312). In Schneiderman v. United States, supra, the Court, after examining the same "classical" Marxist literature that is in evidence here, said of the dictatorship of the proletariat (at 142):

> "In the general sense the term may be taken to describe a state in which the workers or the masses, rather than the bourgeoisie or capitalists are the dominant class. Theoretically it is control by a class, not a dictatorship in the sense of absolute and total rule by one individual. So far as the record before us indicates, the concept is a fluid one, capable of adjustment to different conditions in different countries. There are only meager indications of the form the 'dictatorship' would take in this country. It does not appear that it would necessarily mean the end of representative government or the federal system." [115]

The only testimony before the Board as to the attributes of a dictatorship of the proletariat confirms the finding of the Schneiderman decision. The testimony of petitioner's witness Aptheker was that freedom of the press and religion and freedom to criticize the policies of the government exist in the Soviet Union and that a multi-party system may continue (as in China and the Eastern European countries) where the Communist Party has won ascendancy, until such time as class antagonisms, and with them the basis for more than one party, disappear (R. 1306-08).

[115] Cf. a recent statement by the Communist Party of Great Britain: "Just as the Russian people won political power by the Soviet road which was dictated by their historical conditions and background of Tsarist rule, and the working people in the People's Democracies and China won political power in their own way in their historical conditions, so the British Communists declare that the people of Britain can transform capitalist democracy into a real People's Democracy, transforming Parliament, the product of Britain's historic struggle for democracy, into the democratic instrument of the will of the vast majority of her people." The British Road to Socialism (London, 1952) p. 12.

It is apparent therefore that the evidence wholly fails to establish the existence of a world Communist movement having the objectives described in section 2.

Means. Section 2(1) and (11) describes, a world Communist movement which employs espionage, sabotage, terrorism and violence as the means for accomplishing its objectives.

The record is completely devoid of evidence of the means employed by the Communist Parties of countries other than the United States to attain their objectives. It is equally without evidence, and the Board cites none, that petitioner resorts to espionage, sabotage, terrorism, or violence. On the contrary, petitioner's constitution (A. G. Ex. 374) condemns the use or advocacy of violence, and petitioner's witness Aptheker testified without contradiction that adherents of Marxism have always bitterly denounced and fought against anarchistic concepts of terrorism and sabotage, as has petitioner (R. 1265-67). Moreover, the court below did not concur in the Board's conclusion that petitioner advocates violent or other illegal means for the achievement of its objectives. (See supra, p. 155).

The petitioner's witnesses testified, without contradiction, that there is no "world Communist movement" as described in Section 2. According to their testimony, a world Communist movement exists today only in the sense that there are Communist Parties in most nations which are independent of one another, but which share a common working-class science and world outlook, and work for the eventual establishment of socialism in their respective countries by the free choice of a majority of the people of each country. (Tr. 15229-30, 15950, 15137-39).

It is apparent from the foregoing that the finding of the Board that "there exists a world Communist movement, substantially as described in section 2" has no foundation whatsoever in the evidence. This is confirmed by an examination of the grounds upon which the court below relied in affirming the Board's finding.

The court's conclusion was based (R. 2133-37) on its reading of the Communist Manifesto; Stalin's Problems of Leninism and Foundations of Leninism; [116] the Theses and Statutes adopted by the Communist International in 1920; and the Programme of the Communist International, adopted at the Sixth Congress of that organization in 1928 and superseded by the resolutions of the Seventh Congress in 1935 (A. G. Exs. 125 and 137). From these works the court below found that there is a world Communist movement having the following characteristics: (1) The movement has as its ultimate objective "a classless, stateless society ruled by the proletariat of the world." [117] (2) "The basic concepts of this ultimate objective are that the sole value is labor and that capitalism and nationalism are merely means for exploiting the masses of workers." (3) The program of the movement "calls for a small hard core of revolutionaries, formed into a disciplined Party in every country," which is to attain control of the government in order to destroy its present form and ultimately weld it into the stateless world society. (5) In the interim period, the Soviet Union, being the first and so far biggest government under Communist control, "must be protected and preserved as Communistic at any cost" (R. 3137-38).

[116] The American editions of these works of Stalin which were introduced were published in 1934 and 1932, respectively. They were written in 1926 and 1924, respectively, A.G. Exs. 138, 121.

[117] The court does not explain how there can be a proletariat, which by definition is a class, in a classless society, or how it can rule in a stateless society.

Accordingly, the court below found that there is a world Communist movement in the sense that there are Communist parties in various countries which base their program and activities on a common economic and political outlook, and work toward the ultimate achievement of a common social goal—a universal, classless, stateless society.

The movement found by the court lacks all of the essential characteristics attributed to the world Communist movement described in section 2 and palpably is not the movement postulated by that section. Accordingly, if this Court concludes that Congress left this issue for determination by the Board, the decision below must be reversed for a complete failure of proof.

III. The Findings of the Board Are Based on Incompetent and Discredited Evidence and on Misrepresentation of the Evidence.

The case for the registration order, such as it is, rests on the testimony of witnesses whose unreliability was thoroughly established. The Attorney General paraded to the stand some of the most notorious professional witnesses on the current scene, including Budenz, Matusow, Crouch, Manning Johnson, Gitlow, and Markward. The Department of Justice must have known that many, if not all, of these witnesses were unworthy of credence. As the record shows, the testimony of at least three of them had been rejected as false in prior proceedings.[118] One witness had previously admitted committing perjury in appearances for the government, and had declared (and reiterated in this proceeding) a readiness to continue doing so.[119] Another had on several occasions, while a government witness, given perjured testimony (repeated in this proceeding) as to her financial arrangements with the Department of Justice, in order to pose as an unpaid patriot.[120] Another witness (Matusow) was known by the Department of Justice to be psychoneurotic.[121] Still another gave a false version of a conversation which contradicted testimony given by him as a government witness a few weeks before.[122]

[118] Honig's testimony was rejected by Judge Sears, the presiding officer in the first Bridges deportation case (Tr. 6439-40). In the recent perjury prosecution of Harry Bridges, the Ninth Circuit rejected the testimony of Johnson and Crouch that Bridges had attended a Communist Party convention, because unimpeachable documentary evidence established that the alleged attendance was impossible. See Bridges v. United States, 199 F. 2d 811, 841.

Ten of the Attorney General's witnesses [123] had been paid spies for the F.B.I. while in the Party.[124] Seven of the nine other ex-Communist witnesses were also professional anti-Communists, in the sense that they derived all or a substantial portion of their income from anti-Communist activities, testimony, and writings.[125] Three of them were at the time of testifying employees of the Department of [123] The Attorney General called twenty-two witnesses, of whom nineteen had once held membership in the Communist Party. The other three witnesses were Mosely, whose testimony related solely to "non-deviation" (see supra, p. 137), and two persons who translated or identified a few documents (R. 134-36).

[124] The Board's Report lists nine as "witnesses who joined or rejoined" petitioner "as a result of conferences with the Federal Bureau of Investigation" (R. 134-35). In addition to these, however, Matusow admittedly spied for the F.B.I. while in the Party (Tr. 1295).

Justice.[126] Some of the nineteen former members admitted spying for the F.B.I. on other organizations, including labor unions.[127] Some admitted that they had informed on relatives and friends and on persons whom they, while agents of the F.B.I., had induced to join or evidence interest in the Party.[128]

Subsequent to the hearing, one of the Attorney General's witnesses (Matusow) admitted a series of perjuries and two others (Crouch and Manning Johnson) had their unreliability so publicly exposed that the Department of Justice has stopped using them as witnesses (see infra, p. 212). Still others have in various ways been thoroughly discredited.[129]

[126] Lautner, Nowell, Johnson (see references in preceding footnote). In addition, Crouch had been under contract with the Immigration and Naturalization Service for appearance as a witness in 15 deportation cases (Tr. 5208, 5786).

[127] Janowitz (Tr. 12837-8, 12858-63); Philbrick (Tr. 8130-1, 8135-7, 8141-2); Scarletto (Tr. 13551).

[128] Markward, a well-paid spy for the F.B.I. inside the Party (R. 201-05), solicited subscriptions to the Daily Worker in Negro neighborhoods by explaining that the paper supported equal rights for Negroes. Then she reported to the F.B.I. the names of those whom she had induced to subscribe (R. 751-52). She also reported to the F.B.I. the names of persons she recruited as members of the Communist Party by telling them of its work against racial discrimination (Tr. 7812-14). Cummings, while an F.B.I. spy, induced relatives and fellow factory workers to join the Party; then he reported the names of his recruits to the F.B.I. (Tr. 11011, 11021-4). As to Blanc, see Tr. 8560.

[129] E.g., Gitlow recently testified that among "the ministers who carried the instructions of the Communist Party or collaborated with it" were Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Rabbi Judah L. Magnes, Rev. John Haynes Holmes, and other eminent clergymen (Hearing before Comm. on Un-American Activities, H.R. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. July 7, 1953, p. 2077). Markward's identification of Annie Lee Moss as a member of the Communist Party was rejected by the Department of Defense (N. Y. Times, Feb. 24, 1954, p. 1; Jan. 20, 1955, p. 1). Secretary of State Dulles rejected Budenz' positive identification of John Carter Vincent as a member of the Communist Party (Hearings before Internal Security Subc. of Comm. on Judiciary, Sen., 82d Cong., 1st Sess. pt. 2, p. 625; N. Y. Times, March 5, 1953, p. 8).

Cross-examination of the Attorney General's witnesses developed not only their general unreliability, but also that their testimony in this proceeding was shot through with fabrications. The Board stated that "we have considered and resolved the inconsistencies in the testimony of certain of [the Attorney General's] witnesses" (R. 3). This is not true. The Board not only failed to consider the damage done to the credibility and reputation of the Attorney General's witnesses, but also relied heavily on testimony proven to be false and in some cases repudiated or withdrawn by the witness himself. It ignored all testimony of the Attorney General's witnesses which was favorable to petitioner, relied on obviously incompetent evidence, and attributed to the Attorney General's witnesses testimony which they did not give. Its only standard for the acceptance or rejection of evidence was whether or not it supported (by the Board's irrational criteria) the preconceived conclusion.

To illustrate our assertions within reasonable space limits, we will deal with the findings on five subjects which are given major significance in the Report.

Petitioner's Disaffiliation From the Communist International.

Petitioner disaffiliated from the Communist International at a special convention held in November 1940 (R. 13). One of the major props of the Report is that this disaffiliation "did not alter in any substantive way" petitioner's relationship with the International (R. 14, 6, 130).

The only evidence which can support this finding was testimony by the notorious Paul Crouch. Crouch testified that Earl Browder told a meeting of petitioner's leaders, held in connection with the 1940 disaffiliation convention, that the actual relations between the two organizations "would remain exactly the same in the future as they had in the past" (R. 422). The Report accepts this testimony

(R. 14). It ignores the testimony of petitioner's witness, Miss Flynn, that in fact the relations between the two organizations terminated in 1940 (R. 1286). Yet Miss Flynn's testimony was not only uncontradicted, but was confirmed by the complete absence of evidence of communications or dealings between the organizations after the disaffiliation. The Report also conceals the fact that cross-examination revealed that Crouch had never previously testified to Browder's alleged statement in his innumerable appearances as an anti-Communist witness (R. 5534-5601). Finally, the Report suppresses the fact that Crouch's story was directly contradicted by the Attorney General's own witness, Lautner, as well as by Miss Flynn, both of whom attended the leadership meeting referred to by Crouch (R. 991-993, 1284-1286; C. P. Ex. 13).

The Reconstitution of the Communist Party.

In 1944, under the leadership of its former general secretary, Earl Browder, the Communist Party was dissolved and the Communist Political Association formed to succeed it. Thereafter, in 1945, believing that this action was erroneous, American Communists reconstituted the Communist Party at a convention held in July (R. 15).

In April 1945, Jacques Duclos, a French Communist leader, published an article in France which sharply criticized Browder's policies and the dissolution of the Communist Party. The article is addressed to French Communists as an answer to questions raised by many of them regarding developments in America (A. G. Ex. 208, p. 656). Some years later, Duclos informed Miss Flynn that he wrote the article to convince those French Communists who favored applying Browder's policies in France of the error of the latter's views (R. 1280). The article first came to the attention of American Communists in May, 1945, as a result of a news dispatch in the New York World Telegram (R. 1291).

The Report finds that "the facts directly surrounding the reconstitution are indicative of foreign domination and control of [petitioner]" (R. 16). It finds that prior to the appearance of the World Telegram story, Dmitri Manuilsky, a Soviet delegate to the San Francisco U. N. Conference, "sent word to [petitioner] to the effect that it should heed Duclos' statement concerning the reconstitution of the Communist Party" (R. 60). These findings rest on a distorted version of hearsay testimony given on direct examination by Budenz, who was the only government witness to testify on the subject, and which itself was exposed as a fabrication.

On direct examination, Budenz testified that early in May 1945, and prior to the receipt in this country of any information as to the existence of the Duclos article, he hastily read one-third of a letter from Joseph Starobin, the Daily Worker correspondent in San Francisco. Over petitioner's objection to this hearsay, Budenz was permitted to testify that the letter reported that Manuilsky had expressed indignation that petitioner had not criticized U. S. Government officials more severely and that it should "observe more carefully the guidance and the counsel of the French Communists" (R. 1136-1137).

Contrary to the Report, therefore, Budenz did not quote Manuilsky as mentioning Duclos' article or as saying anything about reconstituting the Communist Party.

Moreover, the Report ignores the fact that cross-examination established that Budenz had given two earlier versions of the alleged Starobin letter, which were contradictory of his testimony before the Board as well as of each other (R. 1182-1185).[130] The Report also ignores [130] Budenz testified that he had made a report of this story to the F.B.I., but was unable to state with which, if any, of his three public versions it was consistent (R. 1184-85). Petitioner thereupon moved for the production of this report by the Attorney General (R. 1185). Under the authorities, it was clearly entitled petitioner's testimony that the reconstitution of the Party was the product of an independent decision of the American Communists, based on their own experience, though undoubtedly influenced by Duclos' analysis (R. 1292-1296).

In an effort to build up its false thesis that the Duclos article was a Moscow directive, the Report finds that Duclos had been in Moscow shortly before the article was published (R. 16). This finding is based on testimony which was stricken at the suggestion of counsel for the Attorney General when cross-examination developed that it was obviously erroneous (R. 858-59).

Force and Violence.

The Report finds that petitioner advocates the violent overthrow of the Government (e.g., R. 44, 121).[131] Most of the "documentation" of this finding consists of fragments of the writings of Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin, which were given a contrary interpretation in Schneiderman v. United States, supra. In addition, the Report supports its finding on this subject by references to the testimony of Honig, Johnson, Meyer, Matusow, Scarletto, and Budenz among others (R. 121).

Both Honig and Johnson so testified on direct examination. The Report, however, ignores their contrary testimony on cross-examination.

Cross-examination of Honig developed that, throughout his membership in the Communist Party from 1927 to 1939, either to the report, or to have the witness' testimony on the matter disregarded. Gordon v. United States, 344 U. S. 414; United States v. Krulewich, 145 F. 2d 76, 78; Christoffel v. United States, 200 F. 2d 734, 738; Edwards v. United States, 312 U. S. 473, 479; United States v. Grayson, 166 F. 2d 863, 870. The motion was denied by the Panel (R. 1185) and its action affirmed by the Board (R. 128). For this reason alone the Board erred in making findings on the Budenz testimony.

[131] As we have seen (supra, p. 155), the court below did not accept this proposition.

he believed and petitioner taught that when a majority of the American people were ready to do away with capitalism and establish socialism, they would be so strong and make their desire so plain that there would be no need for violence. Violence would be required only if the capitalists forcibly attempted to suppress the people's desire for change (R. 504-06).

Cross-examination of Johnson showed that petitioner taught that "overthrow" of the government would not necessarily involve violence, but referred only to a fundamental change in the economic system by the substitution of socialism for capitalism (R. 675-77). Cross-examination further developed that petitioner taught that it would not "attempt a revolution" until it had first won the support of a majority of the American people (R. 677).

Meyer said nothing to support the Board's finding. Matusow gave conflicting testimony on this issue (as on almost every other question on which he was examined), including testimony that petitioner taught in 1949 that socialism would be brought about "by evolution or revolution" (R. 1053-54).

The Budenz testimony relied on by the Report is a rendition of a purported 1940 statement of Eugene Dennis on turning "'imperialist war' into civil war" (R. 114, 127). The Report conceals the fact that in 1946, five years closer to the event, Budenz had given a contradictory version of the same alleged conversation. As then testified to, the conversation had nothing to do with force and violence or fomenting civil war (R. 1178-80).[131a]

The testimony of Scarletto was that at a local Party club meeting in 1950, the club chairman and members urged enlistment in the armed forces for the purpose of sabotaging the Korean war (R. 47). The Report accepts this testimony without mentioning the fact that only a few weeks earlier the witness had given an entirely different account of the same incident when he testified under oath as a government witness in another proceeding. His testimony on that occasion was that it was he alone who proposed entering the armed services for the purpose of sabotage (R. 1091-92). Thus the Report attributes the advocacy of sabotage to petitioner and its members when the evidence shows that, if it occurred at all, it was the act of an agent provocateur.[132]

Equally blatant is the Report's concealment of the testimony of the Attorney General's witness Lautner on this issue. Lautner was a member of the Communist Party from 1927 until his expulsion in 1950, and was the only one of the Attorney General's witnesses who held an official Party position of any consequence subsequent to 1945 (R. 135). Lautner did not testify that petitioner advocated force and violence at any time during his twenty-three year membership. On the contrary, he conceded that at the time he left the organization in 1950, petitioner taught and advocated the peaceful transition to socialism (R. 979-80, 983-84, 986-88; C.P. Ex. 55, pp. 6-7; C.P. Ex. 58, pp. 125-28).

Financial Aid.

The Report's findings on the issue of financial aid are drawn largely from the direct testimony of Gitlow, Budenz, and Matusow.

The Report finds that in 1949, the petitioner through International Publishers received from the Soviet Union book [132] Furthermore, Scarletto admitted that the account of the incident which he gave in this proceeding was contradictory to his report of the same incident to the F.B.I. (R. 1092). Yet the panel denied petitioner's motion for production of this report (ibid.), and the Board affirmed its ruling (R. 128). It was therefore clear error for the Board to rely on the contradicted testimony (see supra, p. 204, ftn. 130).

plates, English translations of books, and page proofs, all without charge (R. 88). This finding is a misrepresentation of hearsay testimony of Matusow. He was permitted to testify over objection that in 1949 the head of International Publishers told him that that company had received such materials at some undisclosed time in the past (R. 1036-37). There is nothing in Matusow's story to establish the date on which the materials were received. Nor is there anything to suggest that petitioner was aware of or benefited by the transactions. Matusow has since confessed that his story was an invention. False Witness (1955), pp. 101, 102.

The Report's finding that in 1928 an American trade-union delegation to the Soviet Union was organized at the direction of, and financed by, the Communist International (R. 187) is based upon testimony of Gitlow which was conclusively proved to be a fabrication by his own admissions on cross-examination and by documentary evidence. To give only one example, he testified on direct that the technical staff of this delegation consisted entirely of Communists. He had to change this feature of his story when confronted with documentary evidence that the technical staff consisted of well known non-Communists, including Paul H. Douglas (now a United States Senator), Rexford Guy Tugwell, Stuart Chase, and George S. Counts. (Cf. R. 233-34, 273, with R. 273-78 and C. P. Ex. 1.)

The findings that the Communist International furnished "substantial" sums to petitioner in connection with the 1928 presidential campaign, a 1929 factional dispute, and work in the United Mine Workers (R. 86-7), are likewise derived from Gitlow's direct testimony. On cross-examination it was shown that in prior writings and testimony Gitlow had given three different and mutually contradictory versions of these alleged incidents and the amounts involved (R. 283-295), so that, for example, the amount allegedly supplied in connection with the 1929 factional dispute varied from $50,000 to "upwards of $1,000,000" (R. 291-95).

The finding that in 1939 petitioner's treasurer stated that Soviet funds were not then available for the Daily Worker (R. 88), is based on testimony of Budenz. But the Report fails to mention that this was another newly-[illegible] episode which was never before mentioned by Budenz in his numerous prior appearances and copious writings (R. 1180-81), and which was belied by Budenz' testimony before a Senate Committee that he had no knowledge that petitioner had ever obtained any funds from Soviet sources (R. 1182).

The findings that about 1940 the Daily Worker received news dispatches from Runag free and that petitioner caused false registration statements to be filed with the State Department misrepresenting this relationship (R. 88, 106) are based on testimony of Budenz. Budenz' direct testimony on these matters was proven to be a mass of falsehoods by documentary evidence and by the changes in his direct testimony when cross-examined. (See R. 1168-73, 1191-98; C. P. Exs. 70-75, inclusive.)

Representatives of the Communist International.

The Report identifies J. Peters and Gerhart Eisler as one-time representatives of the Communist International who were "active in the United States after 1940" (R. 60). It thus insinuates that Peters and Eisler were a source of foreign control over petitioner subsequent to petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International in 1940. The record exposes the falsity of the insinuation.

The identification of Peters as a representative from the Communist International is a misrepresentation of testimony by the Attorney General's witness Nowell that in the early 1930's Peters was petitioner's representative to the Communist International (R. 399).[138]

[138] In its brief below (p. 141), the Board acknowledged the Report's erroneous description of Peters.

Evidence to the effect that Eisler was a representative of the Communist International was confined, with the exception of some Budenz testimony, to the period before 1936 (R. 320-25, 660-61, 692-93, 874).

The Attorney General's evidence showed that Eisler left the United States in that year (R. 656). Uncontradicted testimony offered by petitioner showed that Eisler's return to this country in the early 1940's was not on any mission to petitioner. He came here as an anti-fascist refugee in transit to Mexico, but was prevented from reaching his destination by the U. S. immigration authorities, who kept him in the United States against his will (R. 1300-01).

The only testimony linking Eisler to the Communist International after his departure from the United States in 1936 came from Budenz. This was flimsy hearsay, as is revealed by the Board's own statement that Budenz testified "that there was talk of Eisler as a Comintern representative in 1945" (R. 60). In addition, this hearsay was exposed as a typical Budenz invention. For it was shown that the witness had failed to make any such identification when he appeared in 1949 as a witness in the trial of Eisler for perjury, where the latter's alleged connection with the Communist International was a material issue (R. 1187-91; Eisler v. United States, 176 F. 2d 21, 23, 25).

When dealing with petitioner's witnesses the Board adopted an entirely different standard from that it employed for the professional informers upon whose false testimony it enthusiastically relied. The testimony of petitioner's witnesses was ignored or disbelieved even when in all substantial respects it was uncontradicted. Two examples will illustrate the Board's technic.

The Report "discounts" uncontradicted testimony of Gates because of his claimed arrogance toward counsel for the Attorney General (R. 17-18). The Report does not explain why it rejects testimony to the same effect by Miss

Flynn (ibid.), which it does not "discount." Moreover, the Report consistently relies on testimony of the Attorney General's witness Kornfeder. Yet he acted so arrogantly, not only to counsel but also to the then chairman of the panel, that a majority of the panel found his conduct contemptuous (R. 340-44). Needless to say, the Report suppresses this episode.[134]

Another example of the Board's double standard it its disparagement of petitioner's witness Aptheker. To illustrate a point in his testimony, Aptheker referred to an incident when Frederick Douglass, arrested for an attempt to escape from slavery, falsely denied the charge. Aptheker expressed the opinion that Douglass was the moral person and the committing magistrate the immoral person in this incident (R. 1314-16). The Report grasps at this statement to impeach Aptheker by asserting that it "is indicative of a viewpoint that might permit his conscience to misstate facts if they did not favor his side" (R. 39).

This reasoning, fanciful enough in itself, is fantastic in the light of the Report's suppression of the numerous instances in which the Attorney General's witnesses not only "might" but did "permit" their consciences to misstate facts and of its acceptance of the testimony of Manning Johnson despite his admission that he had previously given perjured testimony and was ready to do so again (see supra, pp. 199-200).

The Board's application of a double standard of credibility and its reliance on tales of the remote past demonstrably concocted by disreputable professional informers require that the registration order be set aside as unsupported by the evidence.

[134] In addition, the Report relies on an exhibit, identified by Kornfeder on direct examination, as a publication of petitioner's establishing its adoption of the "twenty-one points" for affiliation to the Communist International (R. 12), notwithstanding the fact that, on cross examinaion, the witness conceded that his identification had been erroneous and that the publication was not petitioner's (R. 349-51). The court below also made the mistake of relying on this exhibit (R. 2139).

IV. The Court Below Erred in Denying Petitioner's Motion for Leave to Adduce Additional Evidence.

While this proceeding was pending before the court below, petitioner moved pursuant to section 14 of the Act for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board.[135] The motion and supporting affidavit in substance stated and offered to prove that subsequent to the conclusion of the proceeding before the Board two of the Attorney General's principal witnesses, Crouch and Johnson, committed perjury in other proceedings [136] and that a third, Matusow, admitted a course of perjury.[137] The moving papers further stated that because of the public disclosure of the perjury of these three informers, the Attorney General had ceased to employ them as witnesses (R. 2053-66).[138]

Petitioner's motion and affidavit further showed from an analysis of the Report that in numerous instances the Board had rested material findings of fact adverse to petitioner in whole or in part on the testimony of these three witnesses (R. 2056, 2065-66).[139]

[136] Johnson before the International Organizations Loyalty Board in a proceeding with respect to Dr. Ralph J. Bunche; Crouch, in U. S. v. Kuzma, a Smith Act conspiracy prosecution in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, and Matter of Jacob Burck, a deportation proceeding (R. 2059-63).

[137] These admissions were made to Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam and to Messrs. Russell Brown and Robert Norvall, law associates of former Attorney General J. Howard McGrath (R. 2063-64).

[138] As petitioner's affidavit also shows, the cross-examination of these three informers in their appearance before the Board had developed a pattern of false testimony both in this proceeding and, in the case of Crouch and Johnson, in prior proceedings (R. 2058).

[139] The Board's annotated version of the Report reveals that the Board supported its findings of fact with 36 separate references to Subsequent to the decision below, Matusow, by affidavits and from the witness stand, recanted as perjurious his testimony in two other proceedings (U. S. v. Jencks, D. C., W. D. Tex.; U. S. v. Flynn et al., D. C., S. D. N. Y..).[140] In addition, Matusow has written and published a book, False Witness, in which he details numerous instances in which he gave false testimony under oath, including (pp. 101-102) his testimony before the Board in this proceeding. Finally, the Board recently ruled that it would disregard all of the testimony of Matusow in another proceeding before it because of the admissions made by him to Bishop Oxnam and Mr. Brown. Report of the Board, Brownell v. Labor Youth League, No. 102-53, pp. 4-5.

The Board filed no counter affidavit in opposition to petitioner's motion. It opposed the motion, which it analogized to a motion for a new trial, on the ground that there was no showing that the additional evidence would probably change the result, and asserted that the Board could have ignored the testimony of the three witnesses in toto without altering its ultimate conclusion. It further urged that the motion should be denied because the additional evidence went only to the issue of credibility. (R. 2067-76.)

the testimony of Crouch, 25 to the testimony of Johnson, and 24 to the testimony of Matusow (R. 2065-66). To cite but four examples: Matusow's is the only testimony relied on by the Board to support its findings that petitioner advocated the violent overthrow of the government in the post-Act period and that it received foreign financial aid subsequent to 1940 (R. 2022, 1964). The Board's key finding that petitioner's 1940 disaffiliation from the Communist International was spurious is based on the testimony of Crouch (R. 1829, 1814, 2038). And the Board relied heavily on the testimony of Johnson for its findings with reference to the authority over petitioner exercised by alleged representatives of the Communist International (R. 1911, 1974, 2030, 2032).

[140] After a hearing in the Jencks case, the District Court denied a motion for a new trial based upon Matusow's perjurious testimony. The court in the Flynn case on April 22, 1955 granted a new trial to two of the defendants.

The court below denied petitioner's motion without opinion, Judge Bazelon not participating.

The action of the court violated section 14 of the Act. The Board's analogy of a motion under that section to a motion for a new trial is faulty. A motion under section 14 need not establish that the new evidence will probably change the result. All that need be established is that such evidence "is material"—i.e., that it might change the decision made by the agency.[141] Clearly, the original testimony of the three informer witnesses in question was material since, as appears from the Report, the Board relied on it extensively in making subsidiary findings of fact. The additional evidence proffered by petitioner would have destroyed the credibility of this testimony.[142] Obviously, therefore, the additional evidence was itself material.

The decision below is contrary to the decision of this Court in applying a similar provision of the National Labor Relations Act. NLRB v. Indiana and Michigan Electric Co., 318 U. S. 9 There the additional evidence sought to be adduced went to the credibility of three witnesses whom, in the words of the Court (at 20), "the Board's staff thought useful to call, and on whom the examiner plainly relied." Despite the Board's denial that it had relied on the testimony of these witnesses and its statement to the Court that it was willing to omit their testimony from the record, the Court held that the motion to adduce had been correctly granted because the additional "evidence, if taken, might change the result." (At 23,

[141] Section 14 omits the usual requirement that the applicant show grounds for not having adduced the additional evidence in the administrative proceeding. In any event, it is undisputed that all the additional evidence relied on by petitioner developed subsequent to the agency hearing and most of it subsequent to the submission of the case to the court below (R. 2054).

[142] The Board acknowledged as much in the case of Matusow, in ruling that it would disregard all of his testimony in the Labor Youth League case. See supra, p. 213.

emphasis supplied.) The Court further said (at 28): "The statute demands respect for the judgment of the Board as to what the evidence proves. But the court is given discretion to see that before a party's rights are finally foreclosed his case has been fairly heard. Findings cannot be said to have been fairly reached unless material evidence which might impeach, as well as that which will support, its findings, is heard and weighed."

So here the findings of the Board cannot be said to have been fairly reached unless it hears and weighs the evidence impeaching the three witnesses whose testimony the Attorney General believed to be material and upon which the Board heavily relied. The Board's protestation that it could have ignored the testimony of these witnesses in toto and reached the same result, like the similar protestation of the National Labor Relations Board, is therefore unavailing.

Petitioner's motion presents an issue of great public importance. The reckless use by the Department of Justice of professional informers in "security" cases is compromising the administration of justice. It has aroused widespread apprehension and alarm, particularly in the light of current revelations of the untrustworthiness of testimony which the government has bought and paid for. As has recently been stated (N. Y. Times editorial, July 8, 1954):

> "If the Department of Justice feels it essential to use informers in the anti-Communist prosecutions under the law, it has the unmistakable duty to follow up relentlessly any indication that they may not be telling the truth. As the law enforcement agency of our government, the Department of Justice has a primary obligation to maintain its own integrity and that of its agents." [143]

[143] Cf. the recently televised statement by the Attorney General that when one of the government's informer witnesses is found to be unreliable, "then it is the government's obligation to follow up to see

When the Department of Justice and administrative agencies are derelict in this obligation the courts should be scrupulous to enforce it by insisting, at a minimum, that the evidence of perjury be heard and considered. So much, at least, is required if the abuse of the judicial process through the use of hired informers is to be curbed and the liberties of individuals and organizations safeguarded against false testimony. The failure of the court below to take this minimal action requires a reversal.

CONCLUSION

The Act and the order of the Board are the extreme product of an environment that has spawned a host of governmental and extra-governmental measures alien to the American tradition. In the name of national security, violence has been done to the Bill of Rights and deep inroads have been made in our freedom. Unless arrested, this process threatens to take us down the road to a police state.[144]

Current assaults upon democratic liberty were initiated on the premise that it was necessary for the protection of that he is punished and that anybody who has been hurt by his testimony, if it's false, is given a new chance." New York World-Telegram, March 28, 1955.

[144] As the General Council of the Presbyterian Churches declared in its Letter to Presbyterians, supra: "Under the plea that the structure of American society is in eminent peril of being shattered by a satanic conspiracy, dangerous developments are taking place in our national life. Favored by an atmosphere of intense disquiet and suspicion, a subtle but potent assault upon basic human rights is now in progress. * * * Treason and dissent are being confused. * * * A great many people, within and without our government, approach the problem of Communism in a purely negative way. Communism, which is at bottom a secular religious faith of great vitality, is thus being deal with as an exclusively police problem. * * * In the case of a national crisis this emptiness could in the high-sounding name of security, be occupied with ease by a fascist tyranny."

the nation to make Communists the objects of repression. Events, however, have confirmed the inexorable lesson of history that repression cannot be contained. The exceptional measures invoked against Communists have inevitably resulted in the abridgment of the liberties of non-Communists. This has been the experience in almost every area of national life, including government service, private industry, the trade union movement, the clergy, the bar, the arts, the entertainment world, and all forms of voluntary association. Because of their ideas or associations,[145] thousands of individuals have been prosecuted, dismissed from their jobs, blacklisted, ostracized, barred from public platforms, deported, denied the right to travel abroad, or (if foreigners) excluded from the country. No one professing political opinions short of extreme reaction can be confident that he is immune.[146] Even more alarming than the victimization of a growing number of individuals are the pervasive restraints upon the expression of opinion, the burning of books, and the creation of what has been called "the ministry of fear in our country."[147]

Recent months have witnessed some reaction against the departures from fundamental constitutional principles in [145] Guilt by association "appeared in our law only in 1940; since then it has grown and spread until this cloud, no larger than a man's hand, covers the whole horizon." Civil Liberties under Attack (A Symposium) (Univ. of Pa. Press, 1951), p. 17. The doctrine is no longer confined to physical or organizational association, but has been extended (as in the Act and section 5 of the Communist Control Act) to include what may be called guilt by association of ideas.

[146] As Professor Henry Steele Commager recently wrote: "We are all members of many societies, and we may say with John Donne when the principle of association is attacked we ask not for whom the bell tolls, it tolls for us. * * * Just as each new party that came to power during the French Revolution thought it essential to send its predecessors to the guillotine for the lack of true zeal, so the hatemongers of our day are spreading their nets wider and wider until in the end hardly anyone can escape." Guilt—or Innocence—by Association, N. Y. Times Magazine, Nov. 3, 1953.

matters allegedly touching the national security.[148] But a return to the firm ground of the Bill of Rights will be long postponed if the Act and the order of the Board are sustained. Such a decision would freeze into law the worst excesses of the current hysteria and would create the conditions and supply the tools for a vast extension of repression.

The passage of the Act in itself stimulated and was used to justify further inroads on civil liberties, including the enactment of parallel legislation by state and local governments. Moreover, the threat of its implementation against petitioner and an indeterminate number of other organizations gave a powerful impetus to the growth of fear, inhibiting association and expression.

The immediate effect of the Board's order, if allowed to stand, will be to proscribe all of the advocacy of the Communist Party and subject its members to intolerable sanctions. It will bar Communists from lawful political activity; thus invading the prerogative of the electorate. It [148] "There seems little doubt that the atmosphere has been improving in this respect for some time now. There is still plenty of room for further improvement, but the trend is in the right direction —away from exaggerated fears and toward a more reasoned understanding of the balance that must be achieved between national security and individual liberty." New York Times, editorial, June 25, 1955. "When the outgoing president of the American Bar Association is cheered as he calls for a "bloodless revolution" to be led by lawyers to restore our "ancient liberties," there is no doubt that the times have changed. We are in the early stages of a great popular reaction against the hysteria and the demogoguery, the lawlessness and the cruel injustices which we call quite rightly the era of McCarthyism. * * * The great majority of the leaders of American opinion are no longer willing to stand for the theory that espionage, sabotage and subversion can be dealt with only by ignoring the Constitution, and by conniving at what is nakedly and simply lynch law. * * * The ultimate reason for the change is, I believe, the enormous emotional relief which has come since all the great powers have acknowledged publicly that there is no alternative to peace, that they cannot contemplate war." Walter Lippman, N. Y. Herald Tribune, August 25, 1955.

will also lay the foundation for mass prosecutions of petitioner's members for failure to comply with the impossible requirement that they publicly declare that they are criminal conspirators and expose themselves to the Act's intolerable sanctions. For all practical purposes, a final order of the Board will outlaw the Communist Party and make membership in it a crime.

This is the first time in our history that the Communist Party or any other group has been outlawed by federal legislation. No other major democracy outlaws Communists. Only the government of the United States, the most powerful capitalist nation, which proclaims leadership of the free world, asserts that such a measure is necessary for the national safety and compatible with a democratic society.[149]

If the Act and the order of the Board are sustained, the civil and criminal penalties imposed for membership in petitioner will be extended to persons who are not members by any conventional or rational standards. The all-embracing criteria of membership contained in section 5 of the Communist Control Act will jeopardize the livelihood and liberty of countless non-Communists. Such persons as Oppenheimer, Vincent, Davies, Ladejinsky, Condon, Lattimore, Peters, and many thousands of lesser prominence will be natural targets for the civil disabilities imposed on "members" of petitioner and for prosecution upon their failure to register as such.

If the order of the Board becomes final, it will lay a foundation for governmental proscription of many organizations other than petitioner and for the imposition of the [149] Mr. Justice Douglas has observed that America's "growing tendency in the interest of security to take short cuts, to disregard the rights of the individual, to sponsor the cause of intolerance, and to adopt more and more the tactics of the world forces we oppose * * * have helped lose for America the commanding position of moral leadership which we had at the end of World War II." Address to the American Law Institute, New Republic, Nov. 16, 1953.

Act's sanctions against their members. The Board has already ordered two organizations to register as Communist fronts, and proceedings are pending against nine others on the same charge.[150] In addition, the Attorney General recently instituted the first of an announced series of proceedings before the Board to have trade unions declared "Communist-infiltrated." [151]

The number of front and infiltrated organizations can and undoubtedly will be multiplied almost indefinitely in the light of the comprehensive criteria of sections 13(f) and 13A(e).[152] Moreover, if the present categories of organizations prove too restrictive, additional categories can and inevitably will be created. Having moved from action and front to infiltrated organizations, the Act can readily be extended to groups which are "contaminated", "tainted", "tinged" and finally "politically unreliable".

If the Constitution should be held to authorize the proscription of petitioner, there would remain little room for constitutional objections to the application or extension of the Act to almost any other organization. Moreover, the techniques employed against petitioner by the Board, if allowed to stand, will be available for the destruction of [150] The organizations ordered to register are the Jefferson School of Social Science and the Labor Youth League. The names of the organizations against which Board proceedings are pending indicate the diverse nature of their activities: Civil Rights Congress, American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born, Council on African Affairs, Washington Pension Union, National Council for American-Soviet Friendship, Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, United May Day Committee, California Labor School, American Peace Crusade.

[151] Brownell v. International Union of Mine Mill and Smelter Workers, Docket No. 116-56. As appears from the petition, the union was founded in 1893, and is composed of workers in nonferrous metal mining and processing whom it represents as bargaining agent under the National Labor Relations Act.

virtually any group whose views are not governmentally approved. A decision sustaining the Act and the order of the Board would give judicial approval to governmental licensing of all voluntary associations formed to promote political, economic or social objectives.

The invalidity of the Act and the order of the Board are urged here by the Communist Party. But the fundamental issue at stake is the survival of the Constitution, not the Communists. The Act and the Board's order cannot be sustained without validating the premises on which they rest. These are coerced conformity, suppression of peaceable advocacy and assembly, imputation of guilt by association, conviction by legislative fiat, trial by a biased tribunal, judgment on the basis of irrational and vague standards, and reliance on the testimony of professional perjurors. If these execrable policies—condemned here and abroad as "McCarthyism"—may lawfully be applied to petitioner, they will inevitably be extended to the people as a whole. Indeed, the techniques which the Act and the Board employed against petitioner have only recently been used to indict four Democratic administrations and the present Republican administration for "twenty-two years of treason," to impugn the loyalty of two former presidents, and to impeach the integrity of the foreign service and the armed forces.

The proponents of the Act advance the spurious justification that its suppression of democratic liberties is necessary to protect the national security against the menace of Communism. The fact is, however, that the Act is a supreme example of the truth of the statement that, "Security is like liberty, in that many are the crimes committed in its name." Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 339 U. S. 537, 551.

The Act does not protect but undermines the national security. It destroys the values most essential to be secured and on which our security rests. Mr. Chief Justice Hughes observed that the opportunity for free political discussion is "essential to the security of the republic." Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359, 369. The present Chief Justice recently stated:

> "We are living in a world of ideas and are going through a war of ideas. Everywhere there is a contest for the hearts and minds of men.
> "Every political concept is under scrutiny. Our American system like all others is on trial both at home and abroad. The way it works; the manner in which it solves the problems of our day; the extent to which we maintain the spirit of our Constitution with its Bill of Rights, will in the long run do more to make it both secure and the object of adulation than the number of hydrogen bombs we stockpile." (Address before the American Bar Association, 40 A. B. A. Jour. 955.) [153]

The Act was enacted in the summer of 1950, when "the Western world as a whole believed that Korea was the opening campaign of the third world war." [154] This was the political estimate that underlay its enactment. Yet many Americans, including the President, opposed the Act, rightly recognizing that in times of crisis it is essential to the national security to protect fundamental freedoms against false appeals to expediency.

[153] Cf. Lincoln: "What constitutes the bulwark of our liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling sea-coasts; our army and our navy. These are not our reliance against tyranny. All of those may be turned against us without making us weaker for the struggle. Our reliance is in the Love of Liberty which God has planted in us. Our defense is in the spirit which prized liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands everywhere. Destroy this spirit and you have planted the seeds of despotism at your doors. Familiarize yourselves with the chains of bondage, and you prepare your own limbs to wear them. Accustomed to trample on the rights of others, you have lost the genius of your own independence and become the fit subjects of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you." Collected Works, Rutgers Univ. Press, v. 3, p. 95.

[154] Walter Lippman, N. Y. Herald Tribune, Nov. 11, 1952.

Under no circumstances could the national security have been promoted by the wholesale sacrifice of civil liberties and rise of McCarthyism which resulted from the cold war and the hot war in Korea. Moreover, the justification for the onslaught on the Constitution has proved unfounded. A truce was negotiated in Korea. International tensions have relaxed. The leaders of the West and the Soviet Union are exploring avenues and establishing procedures for the peaceful settlement of differences. The President has stated, on the basis of his experiences at Geneva, that Soviet leaders are as sincere as he in their desire for peace.[155] Each of the four heads of state at Geneva declared his belief that the new spirit of conciliation makes a lasting peace a hopeful and realistic possibility.[156] This perspective of peaceful coexistence of the two systems is incompatible with the premise of the Act, spelled out in section 2.[157]

In a period of "competitive co-existence,"[158] no government which infringes the fundamental liberties of its citizens can hope to win the respect and confidence of other peoples. A decision sustaining the Act and the order of the Board would sacrifice our heritage of freedom and ir-

APPENDIX—STATUTES INVOLVED

1. Subversive Activities Control Act

The Internal Security Act of 1950, 64 Stat. 987, 50 U. S. C. 781 ff., as amended, provides in part as follows:

AN ACT

To protect the United States against certain un-American and subversive activities by requiring registration of Communist organizations, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Internal Security Act of 1950".

TITLE I—SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL

SECTION 1. (a) This title may be cited as the "Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950."

(b) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize, require, or establish military or civilian censorship or in any way to limit or infringe upon freedom of the press or of speech as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and no regulation shall be promulgated hereunder having that effect.

NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATION

SEC. 2. As a result of evidence adduced before various committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, the Congress hereby finds that—into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization.

(2) The establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship in any country results in the suppression of all opposition to the party in power, the subordination of the rights of individuals to the state, the denial of fundamental rights and liberties which are characteristic of a representative form of government, such as freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, and of religious worship, and results in the maintenance of control over the people through fear, terrorism, and brutality.

(3) The system of government known as a totalitarian dictatorship is characterized by the existence of a single political party, organized on a dictatorial basis, and by substantial identity between such party and its policies and the government and governmental policies of the country in which it exists.

(4) The direction and control of the world Communist movement is vested in and exercised by the Communist dictatorship of a foreign country.

(5) The Communist dictatorship of such foreign country, in exercising such direction and control and in furthering the purposes of the world Communist movement, establishes or causes the establishment of, and utilizes, in various countries, action organizations which are not free and independent organizations, but are sections of a world-wide Communist organization and are controlled, directed, and subject to the discipline of the Communist dictatorship of such foreign country.

(6) The Communist action organizations so established and utilized in various countries, acting under such control, direction, and discipline, endeavor to carry out the objective of the world Communist movement by bringing about the overthrow of existing governments by any available means, including force if necessary, and setting up Communist totalitarian dictatorships which will be subservient to the most powerful existing Communist totalitarian dictatorship. Although such organizations usually designate themselves as political parties, they are in fact constituent elements of the world-wide Communist movement and promote the objectives of such movement by conspiratorial and coercive tactics, instead of through the democratic processes of a free elective system or through the freedom-preserving means employed by a political party which operates as an agency by which people govern themselves.

(7) In carrying on the activities referred to in paragraph (6), such Communist organizations in various countries are organized on a secret, conspiratorial basis and operate to a substantial extent through organizations, commonly known as "Communist fronts", which in most instances are created and maintained, or used, in such manner as to conceal the facts as to their true character and purposes and their membership. One result of this method of operation is that such affiliated organizations are able to obtain financial and other support from persons who would not extend such support if they knew the true purposes of, and the actual nature of the control and influence exerted upon, such "Communist fronts".

(8) Due to the nature and scope of the world Communist movement, with the existence of affiliated constituent elements working toward common objectives in various countries of the world, travel of Communist members, representatives, and agents from country to country facilitates communication and is a prerequisite for the carrying on of activities to further the purposes of the Communist movement.

(9) In the United States those individuals who knowingly and willfully participate in the world Communist movement, when they so participate, in effect repudiate their allegiance to the United States, and in effect transfer their allegiance to the foreign country in which is vested the direction and control of the world Communist movement.

(10) In pursuance of communism's stated objectives, the most powerful existing Communist dictatorship has, by the methods referred to above, already caused the establishment in numerous foreign countries of Communist totalitarian dictatorships, and threatens to establish similar dictatorships in still other countries.

(11) The agents of communism have devised clever and ruthless espionage and sabotage tactics which are carried out in many instances in form or manner successfully evasive of existing law.

(12) The Communist network in the United States is inspired and controlled in large part by foreign agents who are sent into the United States ostensibly as attaches of foreign legations, affiliates of international organizations, members of trading commissions, and in similar capacities, but who use their diplomatic or semi-diplomatic status as a shield behind which to engage in activities prejudicial to the public security.

(13) There are, under our present immigration laws, numerous aliens who have been found to be deportable, many of whom are in the subversive, criminal, or immoral classes who are free to roam the country at will without supervision or control.

(14) One device for infiltration by Communists is by procuring naturalization for disloyal aliens who use their citizenship as a badge for admission into the fabric of our society.

(15) The Communist movement in the United States is an organization numbering thousands of adherents, rigidly and ruthlessly disciplined. Awaiting and seeking to advance a moment when the United States may be so far extended by foreign engagements, so far divided in counsel, or so far in industrial or financial straits, that overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence may seem possible of achievement, it seeks converts far and wide by an extensive system of schooling and indoctrination. Such preparation by Communist organizations in other countries have aided in supplanting existing governments. The Communist organization in the United States, pursuing its stated objectives, the recent successes of Communist methods in other countries, and the nature and control of the world Communist movement itself, present a clear and present danger to the security of the United States and to the existence of free American institutions, and make it necessary that Congress, in order to provide for the common defense, to preserve the sovereignty of the United States as an independent nation, and to guarantee to each State a republican form of government, enact appropriate legislation recognizing the existence of such worldwide conspiracy and designed to prevent it from accomplishing its purpose in the United States.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this title—

(1) The term "person" means an individual or an organization.

(2) The term "organization" means an organization, corporation, company, partnership, association, trust foundation, or fund; and includes a group of persons, whether or not incorporated, permanently or temporarily associated together for joint action on any subject or subjects.

(3) The term "Communist-action organization" means—

(a) any organization in the United States (other than a diplomatic representative or mission of a foreign government accredited as such by the Department of State) which (i) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, and (ii) operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement as referred to in section 2 of this title; and

(b) any section, branch, fraction, or cell of any organization defined in subparagraph (a) of this paragraph which has not complied with the registration requirements of this title.

(4) The term "Communist-front organization" means any organization in the United States (other than a Communist-action organization as defined in paragraph (3) of this section) which (A) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by a Communist-action organization, and (B) is primarily operated for the purpose of giving aid and support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title.

(4A) The term "Communist-infiltrated organization" means any organization in the United States (other than a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization) which (A) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by an individual or individuals who are, or who within three years have been actively engaged in, giving aid or support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, and (B) is serving, or within three years has served, as a means for (i) the giving of aid or support to any such organization, government, or movement, or (ii) the impairment of the military strength of the United States or its industrial capacity to furnish logistical or other material support required by its Armed Forces: Provided, however, That any labor organization which is an affiliate in good standing of a national federation or other labor organization whose policies and activities have been directed to opposing Communist organizations, any Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement, shall be presumed prima facie not to be a "Communist-infiltrated organization." [1]

(5) The term "Communist organization" means any Communist-action organization, Communist-front organization, or Communist-infiltrated organization.[2]

(6) The term "to contribute funds or services" includes the rendering of any personal service and the making of any gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit, of money or of anything of value, and also the making of any contract, promise, or agreement to contribute funds or services, whether or not legally enforcible.

(7) The term "facility" means any plant, factory or other manufacturing, producing or service establishment, airport, airport facility, vessel, pier, water-front facility, mine, railroad, public utility, laboratory, station, or other establishment or facility, or any part, division, or department of any of the foregoing. The term "defense facility" means any facility designated and proclaimed by the Secretary of Defense pursuant to section 5(b) of this title and included on the list published and currently in effect under such subsection, and which is in compliance with the provisions of such subsection respecting the posting of notice of such designation.

(8) The term "publication" means any circular, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, book, letter, post card, leaflet, or other publication.

[2] As amended by sec. 7(b) of the Communist Control Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 778.

(9) The term "United States", when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States, Territories, and possessions of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Canal Zone.

(10) The term "interstate or foreign commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication (A) between any State, Territory, or possession of the United States (including the Canal Zone), or the District of Columbia, and any place outside thereof, or (B) within any territory or possession of the United States (including the Canal Zone), or within the District of Columbia.

(11) The term "Board" means the Subversive Activities Control Board created by section 12 of this title.

(12) The term "final order of the Board" means an order issued by the Board under section 13 of this title, which has become final as provided in section 14 of this title.

(13) The term "advocates" includes advises, recommends, furthers by overt act, and admits belief in; and the giving, loaning, or promising of support or of money or anything of value to be used for advocating any doctrine shall be deemed to constitute the advocating of such doctrine.

(14) The term "world communism" means a revolutionary movement, the purpose of which is to establish eventually a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in any or all the countries of the world through the medium of an internationally coordinated Communist movement.

(15) The terms "totalitarian dictatorship" and "totalitarianism" mean and refer to systems of government not representative in fact, characterized by (A) the existence of a single political party, organized on a dictatorial basis, with so close an identity between such party and its policies and the governmental policies of the country in which it exists, that the party and the government constitute an indistinguishable unit, and (B) the forcible suppression of opposition to such party.

(16) The term "doctrine" includes, but is not limited to, policies, practices, purposes, aims, or procedures.

(17) The giving, loaning, or promising of support or of money or any other thing of value for any purpose to any organization shall be conclusively presumed to constitute affiliation therewith; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as an exclusive definition of affiliation.

(18) "Advocating the economic, international, and governmental doctrines of world communism" means advocating the establishment of a totalitarian Communist dictatorship in any or all of the countries of the world through the medium of an internationally coordinated Communist movement.

(19) "Advocating the economic and governmental doctrines of any other form of totalitarianism" means advocating the establishment of totalitarianism (other than world communism) and includes, but is not limited to, advocating the economic and governmental doctrines of fascism and nazism.

CERTAIN PROHIBITED ACTS

SEC. 4. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person knowingly to combine, conspire, or agree with any other person to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship, as defined in paragraph (15) of section 3 of this title, the direction and control of which is to be vested in, or exercised by or under the domination or control of, any foreign government, foreign organization, or foreign individual: Provided, however, That this subsection shall not apply to the proposal of a constitutional amendment.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States or of any department or agency thereof, or of any corporation the stock of which is owned in whole or in major part by the United States or any department or agency thereof, to communicate in any manner or by any means, to any other person whom such officer or employee knows or has reason to believe to be an agent or representative of any foreign government or an officer or member of any Communist organization as defined in paragraph (5) of section 3 of this title, any information of a kind which shall have been classified by the President (or by the head of any such department, agency, or corporation with the approval of the President) as affecting the security of the United States, knowing or having reason to know that such information has been so classified, unless such officer or employee shall have been specifically authorized by the President, or by the head of the department, agency, or corporation by which this officer or employee is employed, to make such disclosure of such information.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any agent or representative of any foreign government, or any officer or member of any Communist organization as defined in paragraph (5) of section 3 of this title, knowingly to obtain or receive, or attempt to obtain or receive, directly or indirectly, from any officer or employee of the United States or of any department or agency thereof or of any corporation the stock of which is owned in whole or in major part by the United States or any department or agency thereof, any information of a kind which shall have been classified by the President (or by the head of any such department, agency, or corporation with the approval of the President) as affecting the security of the United States, unless special authorization for such communication shall first have been obtained from the head of the department, agency, or corporation having custody of or control over such information.

(d) Any person who violates any provision of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than ten years, or by both such fine and such imprisonment, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to hold any office, or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

(e) Any person may be prosecuted, tried, and punished for any violation of this section at any time within ten years after the commission of such offense, notwithstanding the provisions of any other statute of limitations: Provided, That if at the time of the commission of the offense such person is an officer or employee of the United States or of any department or agency thereof, or of any corporation the stock of which is owned in whole or in major part by the United States or any department or agency thereof, such person may be prosecuted, tried, and punished for any violation of this section at any time within ten years after such person has ceased to be employed as such officer or employee.

(f) Neither the holding of office nor membership in any Communist organization by any person shall constitute per se a violation of subsection (a) or subsection (c) of this section or of any other criminal statute. The fact of the registration of any person under section 7 or section 8 of this title as an officer or member of any Communist organization shall not be received in evidence against such person in any prosecution for any alleged violation of subsection (a) or subsection (c) of this section or for any alleged violation of any other criminal statute.

EMPLOYMENT OF MEMBERS OF COMMUNIST ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 5. (a) When a Communist organization, as defined in paragraph (5) of section 3 of this title, is registered or there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register, it shall be unlawful—

(1) For any member of such organization, with knowledge or notice that such organization is so registered or that such order has become final—

(A) in seeking, accepting, or holding any nonelective office or employment under the United States, to conceal or fail to disclose the fact that he is a member of such organization; or

(B) to hold any nonelective office or employment under the United States; or

(C) in seeking, accepting, or holding employment in any defense facility, to conceal or fail to disclose the fact that he is a member of such organization; or

(D) if such organization is a Communist-action organization, to engage in any employment in any defense facility; or

(E) [3] to hold office or employment with any labor organization, as that term is defined in section 2(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (29 U. S. C. 152), or to represent any employer in any matter or proceeding arising or pending under that Act.

(2) For any officer or employee of the United States or of any defense facility, with knowledge or notice that such organization is so registered or that such order has become final—

(A) to contribute funds or services to such organization; or

(B) to advise, counsel or urge any person, with knowledge or notice that such person is a member of such organization, to perform, or to omit to perform, any act if such act or omission would constitute a violation of any provision of subparagraph (1) of this subsection.

(b) The Secretary of Defense is authorized and directed to designate and proclaim, and from time to time revise, a list of facilities, as defined in paragraph (7) of section 3 of this title, with respect to the operation of which he finds and determines that the security of the United States requires the application of the provisions of subsection (a) of this section. The Secretary shall cause such list as designated and proclaimed, or any revision thereof, to be promptly published in the Federal Register, and shall promptly notify the management of any facility so listed; whereupon such management shall immediately post conspicuously, and thereafter while so listed keep posted, notice of such designation in such form and in such place or places as to give reasonable notice thereof to all employees of, and to all applicants for employment in, such facility.

(c) [4] As used in this section, the term "member" shall not include any individual whose name has not been made public because of the prohibition contained in section 9(b) of this title.

DENIAL OF PASSPORTS TO MEMBERS OF COMMUNIST ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 6. (a) When a Communist organization as defined in paragraph (5) of section 3 of this title is registered, or there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register, it shall be unlawful for any member of such organization, with knowledge or notice that such organization is so registered or that such order has become final—

[4] Repealed by sec. 7(c) of the Communist Control Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 778.

(1) to make application for a passport, or the renewal of a passport, to be issued or renewed by or under the authority of the United States; or

(2) to use or attempt to use any such passport.

(b) When an organization is registered, or there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring an organization to register, as a Communist-action organization, it shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States to issue a passport to, or renew the passport of, any individual knowing or having reason to believe that such individual is a member of such organization.

(c) [5] As used in this section, the term "member" shall not include any individual whose name has not been made public because of the prohibition contained in section 9(b) of this title.

REGISTRATION AND ANNUAL REPORTS OF COMMUNIST ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 7. (a) Each Communist-action organization (including any organization required, by a final order of the Board, to register as a Communist-action organization) shall, within the time specified in subsection (c) of this section, register with the Attorney General, on a form prescribed by him by regulations, as a Communist-action organization.

(b) Each Communist-front organization (including any organization required, by a final order of the Board, to register as a Communist-front organization) shall, within the time specified in subsection (c) of this section, register with the Attorney General, on a form prescribed by him by regulations, as a Communist-front organization.

(c) The registration required by subsection (a) or (b) shall be made—

[5] See footnote 4.

(1) in the case of an organization which is a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization on the date of the enactment of this title, within thirty days after such date;

(2) in the case of an organization becoming a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization after the date of the enactment of this title, within thirty days after such organization becomes a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization, as the case may be; and

(3) in the case of an organization which by a final order of the Board is required to register, within thirty days after such order becomes final.

(d) The registration made under subsection (a) or (b) shall be accompanied by a registration statement, to be prepared and filed in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, containing the following information:

(1) The name of the organization and the address of its principal office.

(2) The name and last-known address of each individual who is at the time of filing of such registration statement, and of each individual who was at any time during the period of twelve full calendar months next preceding the filing of such statement, an officer of the organization, with the designation or title of the office so held, and with a brief statement of the duties and functions of such individual as such officer.

(3) An accounting, in such form and detail as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, of all moneys received and expended (including the sources from which received and the purposes for which expended) by the organization during the period of twelve full calendar months next preceding the filing of such statement.

(4) In the case of a Communist-action organization, the name and last-known address of each individual who was a member of the organization at any time during the period of twelve full calendar months preceding the filing of such statement.

(5) In the case of any officer or member whose name is required to be shown in such statement, and who uses or has used or who is or has been known by more than one name, each name which such officer or member uses or has used or by which he is known or has been known.

(6) A listing, in such form and detail as the Attorney General shall by regulation prescribe, of all printing presses and machines including but not limited to rotary presses, flatbed cylinder presses, platen presses, lithographs, offsets, photo-offsets, mimeograph machines, multigraph machines, multilith machines, duplicating machines, ditto machines, linotype machines, intertype machines, monotype machines, and all other types of printing presses, typesetting machines or any mechanical devices used or intended to be used, or capable of being used to produce or publish printed matter or material, which are in the possession, custody, ownership, or control of the Communist-action or Communist-front organization or its officers, members, affiliates, associates, group, or groups in which the Communist-action or Communist-front organization, its officers or members have an interest.[6]

(e) It shall be the duty of each organization registered under this section to file with the Attorney General on or before February 1 of the year following the year in which it registers, and on or before February 1 of each succeeding year, an annual report, prepared and filed in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, containing the same information which by subsection (d) is required to be included in a registration statement, except that the information required with respect to the twelve-month period referred to in paragraph (2), (3), or (4) of such subsection shall, in such annual report, be given with respect to the calendar year preceding the February 1 on or before which such annual report must be filed.

(f)(1) It shall be the duty of each organization registered under this section to keep, in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, accurate records and accounts of moneys received and expended (including the sources from which received and purposes for which expended) by such organization.

(2) It shall be the duty of each Communist-action organization registered under this section to keep, in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, accurate records of the names and addresses of the members of such organization and of persons who actively participate in the activities of such organization.

(g) It shall be the duty of the Attorney General to send to each individual listed in any registration statement or annual report, filed under this section, as an officer or member of the organization in respect of which such registration statement or annual report was filed, a notification in writing that such individual is so listed; and such notification shall be sent at the earliest practicable time after the filing of such registration statement or annual report. Upon written request of any individual so notified who denies that he holds any office or membership (as the case may be) in such organization, the Attorney General shall forthwith initiate and conclude at the earliest practicable time an appropriate investigation to determine the truth or falsity of such denial, and, if the Attorney General shall be satisfied that such denial is correct, he shall thereupon strike from such registration statement or annual report the name of such individual. If the Attorney General shall decline or fail to strike the name of such individual from such registration statement or annual report within five months after receipt of such written request, such individual may file with the Board a petition for relief pursuant to section 13(b) of this title.

(h) In the case of failure on the part of any organization to register or to file any registration statement or annual report as required by this section, it shall be the duty of the executive officer (or individual performing the ordinary and usual duties of an executive officer) and of the secretary (or individual performing the ordinary and usual duties of a secretary) of such organization, and of such officer or officers of such organization as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, to register for such organization, to file such registration statement, or to file such annual report, as the case may be.

REGISTRATION OF MEMBERS OF COMMUNIST-ACTION ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 8. (a) Any individual who is or becomes a member of any organization concerning which (1) there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register under section 7(a) of this title as a Communist-action organization, (2) more than thirty days have elapsed since such order has become final, and (3) such organization is not registered under section 7 of this title as a Communist-action organization, shall within sixty days after said order has become final, or within thirty days after becoming a member of such organization, whichever is later, register with the Attorney General as a member of such organization.

(b) Each individual who is or becomes a member of any organization which he knows to be registered as a Communist-action organization under section 7(a) of this title, but to have failed to include his name upon the list of members thereof filed with the Attorney General, pursuant to the provisions of subsections (d) and (e) of section 7 of this title, shall, within sixty days after he shall have obtained such knowledge, register with the Attorney General as a member of such organization.

(c) The registration made by any individual under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be accompanied by a registration statement to be prepared and filed in such manner and form, and containing such information, as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe.

KEEPING OF REGISTERS; PUBLIC INSPECTION; REPORTS TO PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS

SEC. 9. (a) The Attorney General shall keep and maintain separately in the Department of Justice—

(1) a "Register of Communist-Action Organizations", which shall include (A) the names and addresses of all Communist-action organizations registered under section 7, (B) the registration statements and annual reports filed by such organizations thereunder, and (C) the registration statements filed by individuals under section 8; and

(2) a "Register of Communist-Front Organizations", which shall include (A) the names and addresses of all Communist-front organizations registered under section 7, and (B) the registration statements and annual reports filed by such organizations thereunder.

(b) Such registers shall be kept and maintained in such manner as to be open for public inspection: Provided, That the Attorney General shall not make public the name of any individual listed in either such register as an officer or member of any Communist organization until sixty days shall have elapsed after the transmittal of the notification required by section 7 (g) to be sent to such individual, and if prior to the end of such period such individual shall make written request to the Attorney General for the removal of his name from any such list, the Attorney General shall not make public the name of such individual until six months shall have elapsed after receipt of such request by the Attorney General, or until thirty days shall have elapsed after the Attorney General shall have denied such request and shall have transmitted to such individual notice of such denial, whichever is earlier.

(c) The Attorney General shall submit to the President and to the Congress on or before June 1 of each year (and at any other time when requested by either House by resolution) a report with respect to the carrying out of the provisions of this title, including the names and addresses of the organizations listed in such registers and (except to the extent prohibited by subsection (b) of this section) the names and addresses of the individuals listed as members of such organizations.

(d) Upon the registration of each Communist organization under the provisions of this title, the Attorney General shall publish in the Federal Register the fact that such organization has registered as a Communist-action organization, or as a Communist-front organization, as the case may be, and the publication thereof shall constitute notice to all members of such organization that such organization has so registered.

USE OF THE MAILS AND INSTRUMENTALITIES OF INTERSTATE OR FOREIGN COMMERCE

SEC. 10. It shall be unlawful for any organization which is registered under section 7, or for any organization with respect to which there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring it to register under section 7, or determining that it is a Communist-infiltrated organization,[1] or for any person acting for or on behalf of any such organization—

[1] Reference to Communist-infiltrated organizations added by sec. 8(a) of the Communist Control Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 778.

(1) to transmit or cause to be transmitted, through the United States mails or by any means or instrumentality of interstate or foreign commerce, any publication which is intended to be, or which it is reasonable to believe is intended to be, circulated or disseminated among two or more persons, unless such publication, and any envelope, wrapper, or other container in which it is mailed or otherwise circulated or transmitted, bears the following, printed in such manner as may be provided in regulations prescribed by the Attorney General, with the name of the organization appearing in lieu of the blank: "Disseminated by ————————, a Communist organization"; or

(2) to broadcast or cause to be broadcast any matter over any radio or television station in the United States, unless such matter is preceded by the following statement, with the name of the organization being stated in place of the blank: "The following program is sponsored by ————————, a Communist organization".

DENIAL OF TAX DEDUCTIONS AND EXEMPTIONS

SEC. 11. (a) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, no deduction for Federal income-tax purposes shall be allowed in the case of a contribution to or for the use of any organization if at the time of the making of such contribution (1) such organization is registered under section 7, or (2) there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register under section 7 or determining that it is a Communist-infiltrated organization.[8]

(b) No organization shall be entitled to exemption from Federal income tax, under section 101 of the Internal Revenue Code, for any taxable year if at any time during such taxable year (1) such organization is registered under section 7, or (2) there is in effect a final order of the Board

[8] See footnote 7.

requiring such organization to register under section 7 or determining that it is a Communist-infiltrated organization.[9]

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD

SEC. 12. (a) There is hereby established a board, to be known as the Subversive Activities Control Board, which shall be composed of five members, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than three members of the Board shall be members of the same political party. The terms of office of the members of the Board in office on the date of enactment of the Subversive Activities Control Board Tenure Act shall expire at the time they would have expired if such Act had not been enacted. The term of office of each member of the Board appointed after the date of enactment of the Subversive Activities Control Board Tenure Act shall be for five years from the date of expiration of the term of his predecessor, except, that (1) the term of office of that member of the Board who is designated by the President and is appointed to succeed one of the two members of the Board whose terms expire on August 9, 1955 shall be for four years from the date of expiration of the term of his predecessor, and (2) the term of office of any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be for the remainder of the term of his predecessor. Upon the expiration of his term of office a member of the Board shall continue to serve until his successor shall have been appointed and shall have qualified.[9a] The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Board. Any member of the Board may be removed by the President, upon notice and hearing; for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, but for no other cause.

(b) Any vacancy in the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Board, and three members of the Board shall, at all times, constitute a quorum. The Board shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

(c) The Board shall at the close of each fiscal year make a report in writing to the Congress and to the President stating in detail the cases it has heard, the decisions it has rendered, the names, salaries, and duties of all employees of the Board, and an account of all moneys it has disbursed.

(d) Each member of the Board shall receive a salary of $15,000 a year,[10] shall be eligible for reappointment, and shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment.

(e) It shall be the duty of the Board——

(1) upon application made by the Attorney General under section 13(a) of this title, or by any organization under section 13(b) of this title, to determine whether any organization is a "Communist-action organization" within the meaning of paragraph (3) of section 3 of this title, or a "Communist-front organization" within the meaning of paragraph (4) of section 3 of this title; and

(2) upon application made by the Attorney General under section 13(a) of this title, or by any individual under section 13(b) of this title, to determine whether any individual is a member of any Communist-action organization registered, or by final order of the Board required to be registered, under section 7(a) of this title; and

(3) upon any application made under subsection (a) or subsection (b) of section 13A of this title, to determine whether any organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization.[11]

(f) Subject to the civil-service laws and Classification Act of 1949, the Board may appoint and fix the compensation of a chief clerk and such examiners and other personnel as may be necessary for the performance of its functions.

(g) The Board may make such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this title, as may be necessary for the performance of its duties.

(h) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Board such sums as may be necessary to carry out its functions.

REGISTRATION PROCEEDINGS BEFORE BOARD[12]

SEC. 13. (a) Whenever the Attorney General shall have reason to believe that any organization which has not registered under subsection (a) or subsection (b) of section 7 of this title is in fact an organization of a kind required to be registered under such subsection, or that any individual who has not registered under section 8 of this title is in fact required to register under such section, he shall file with the Board and serve upon such organization or individual a petition for an order requiring such organization or individual to register pursuant to such subsection or section, as the case may be. Each such petition shall be verified under oath, and shall contain a statement of the facts upon which the Attorney General relies in support of his prayer for the issuance of such order.

[12] "Registration" added by sec. 9(b) of the Communist Control Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 778.

(b) Any organization registered under subsection (a) or subsection (b) of section 7 of this title, and any individual registered under section 8 of this title, may, not oftener than once in each calendar year, make application to the Attorney General for the cancellation of such registration and (in the case of such organization) for relief from obligation to make further annual reports. Within sixty days after the denial of any such application by the Attorney General, the organization or individual concerned may file with the Board and serve upon the Attorney General a petition for an order requiring the cancellation of such registration and (in the case of such organization) relieving such organization of obligation to make further annual reports. Any individual authorized by section 7(g) of this title to file a petition for relief may file with the Board and serve upon the Attorney General a petition for an order requiring the Attorney General to strike his name from the registration statement or annual report upon which it appears.

(c) Upon the filing of any petition pursuant to subsection (a) or subsection (b) of this section, the Board (or any member thereof or any examiner designated thereby) may hold hearings, administer oaths and affirmations, may examine witnesses and receive evidence at any place in the United States, and may require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records deemed relevant, to the matter under inquiry. Subpenas may be signed and issued by any member of the Board or any duly authorized examiner. Subpenas shall be issued on behalf of the organization or the individual who is a party to the proceeding upon request and upon a statement or showing of general relevance and reasonable scope of the evidence sought. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. Witnesses summoned shall be paid the same fees and mileage paid witnesses in the district courts of the United States. In case of disobedience to a subpoena, the Board may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence. Any of the district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person, issue an order requiring such person to appear (and to produce documentary evidence if so ordered) and give evidence relating to the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district whereof such person is an inhabitant or wherever he may be found. No person shall be held liable in any action in any court, State or Federal, for any damages resulting from (1) his production of any documentary evidence in any proceeding before the Board if he is required, by a subpena issued under this subsection, to produce the evidence; or (2) any statement under oath he makes in answer to a question he is asked while testifying before the Board in response to a subpena issued under this subsection, if the statement is pertinent to the question.

(d)(1) All hearings conducted under this section shall be public. Each party to such proceeding shall have the right to present its case with the assistance of counsel, to offer oral or documentary evidence, to submit rebuttal evidence, and to conduct such cross-examination as may be required for a full and true disclosure of the facts. An accurate stenographic record shall be taken of the testimony of each witness, and a transcript of such testimony shall be filed in the office of the Board.

(2) Where an organization or individual declines or fails to appear at a hearing accorded to such organization or individual by the Board pursuant to this section, the Board may, without further proceedings and without the introduction of any evidence, enter an order requiring such organization or individual to register or denying the application of such organization or individual, as the case may be. Where in the course of any hearing before the Board or any examiner thereof a party or counsel is guilty of misbehavior which obstructs the hearing, such party or counsel may be excluded from further participation in the hearing.

(e) In determining whether any organization is a "Communist-action organization", the Board shall take into consideration—

(1) the extent to which its policies are formulated and carried out and its activities performed, pursuant to directives or to effectuate the policies of the foreign government or foreign organization in which is vested, or under the domination or control of which is exercised, the direction and control of the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title; and

(2) the extent to which its views and policies do not deviate from those of such foreign government or foreign organization; and

(3) the extent to which it receives financial or other aid, directly or indirectly, from or at the direction of such foreign government or foreign organization; and

(4) the extent to which it sends members or representatives to any foreign country for instruction or training in the principles, policies, strategy, or tactics of such world Communist movement; and

(5) the extent to which it reports to such foreign government or foreign organization or to its representatives; and

(6) the extent to which its principal leaders or a substantial number of its members are subject to or

recognize the disciplinary power of such foreign government or foreign organization or its representatives; and

(7) the extent to which, for the purpose of concealing foreign direction, domination, or control, or of expediting or promoting its objectives, (i) it fails to disclose, or resists efforts to obtain information as to, its membership (by keeping membership lists in code, by instructing members to refuse to acknowledge membership, or by any other method); (ii) its members refuse to acknowledge membership therein; (iii) it fails to disclose, or resists efforts to obtain information as to, records other than membership lists; (iv) its meetings are secret; and (v) it otherwise operates on a secret basis; and

(8) the extent to which its principal leaders or a substantial number of its members consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their obligations to such foreign government or foreign organization.

(f) In determining whether any organization is a "Communist-front organization", the Board shall take into consideration—

(1) the extent to which persons who are active in its management, direction, or supervision, whether or not holding office therein, are active in the management, direction, or supervision of, or as representatives of, any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2; and

(2) the extent to which its support, financial or otherwise, is derived from any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2; and

(3) the extent to which its funds, resources, or personnel are used to further or promote the objectives of any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2; and

(4) the extent to which the positions taken or advanced by it from time to time on matters of policy do not deviate from those of any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2.

(g) If, after hearing upon a petition filed under subsection (a) of this section, the Board determines—

(1) that an organization is a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization, as the case may be, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and cause to be served on such organization an order requiring such organization to register as such under section 7 of this title; or

(2) that an individual is a member of a Communist-action organization (including an organization required by final order of the Board to register under section 7(a)), it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and cause to be served on such individual an order requiring him to register as such under section 8 of this title.

(h) If, after hearing upon a petition filed under subsection (a) of this section, the Board determines—

(1) that an organization is not a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization, as the case may be, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts; issue and cause to be served upon the Attorney General an order denying his petition for an order requiring such organization to register as such under section 7 of this title; and send a copy of such order to such organization; or

(2) that an individual is not a member of any Communist-action organization, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts; issue and cause to be served upon the Attorney General an order denying his petition for an order requiring such individual to register as such member under section 8 of this title; and send a copy of such order to such individual.

(i) If, after hearing upon a petition filed under subsection (b) of this section, the Board determines—

(1) that an organization is not a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization, as the case may be, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts; issue and cause to be served upon the Attorney General an order requiring him to cancel the registration of such organization and relieve it from the requirement of further annual reports; and send a copy of such order to such organization; or

(2) that an individual is not a member of any Communist-action organization, or (in the case of an individual listed as an officer of a Communist-front organization) that an individual is not an officer of a Communist-front organization, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts; issue and cause to be served upon the Attorney General an order requiring him to (A) strike the name of such individual from the registration statement or annual report upon which it appears or (B) cancel the registration of such individual under section 8, as may be appropriate; and send a copy of such order to such individual.

(j) If, after hearing upon a petition filed under subsection (b) of this section, the Board determines—

(1) that an organization is a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization, as the case may be, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and cause to be served on such organization an order denying its petition for the cancellation of its registration and for relief from the requirement of further annual reports; or

(2) that an individual is a member of a Communist-action organization, or (in the case of an individual listed as an officer of a Communist-front organization) that an individual is an officer of a Communist-front organization, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and cause to be served on such individual an order denying his petition for an order requiring the Attorney General (A) to strike his name from any registration statement or annual report on which it appears or (B) to cancel the registration of such individual under section 8, as the case may be.

(k) When any order of the Board requiring registration of a Communist organization becomes final under the provisions of section 14(b) of this title, the Board shall publish in the Federal Register the fact that such order has become final, and publication thereof shall constitute notice to all members of such organization that such order has become final.

PROCEEDINGS WITH RESPECT TO COMMUNIST-INFILTRATED ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 13A.[13] (a) Whenever the Attorney General has reason to believe that any organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization, he may file with the Board and serve upon such organization a petition for a determination that such organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization. In any proceeding so instituted, two or more affiliated organizations may be named as joint respondents. Whenever any such petition is accompanied by a certificate of the Attorney General to the effect that the proceeding so instituted is one of exceptional public importance, such proceeding shall be set for hearing at the earliest possible time and all proceedings therein before the Board or any court shall be expedited to the greatest practicable extent.

(b) Any organization which has been determined under this section to be a Communist-infiltrated organization may, within six months after such determination, file with the Board and serve upon the Attorney General a petition for a determination that such organization no longer is a Communist-infiltrated organization.

(c) Each such petition shall be verified under oath, and shall contain a statement of the facts relied upon in support thereof. Upon the filing of any such petition, the Board shall serve upon each party to such proceeding a notice specifying the time and place for hearing upon such petition. No such hearing shall be conducted within twenty days after the service of such notice.

(d) The provisions of subsections (c) and (d) of section 13 shall apply to hearings conducted under this section, except that upon the failure of any organization named as a party in any petition filed by or duly served upon it pursuant to this section to appear at any hearing upon such petition, the Board may conduct such hearing in the absence of such organization and may enter such order under this section as the Board shall determine to be warranted by evidence presented at such hearing.

(e) In determining whether any organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization, the Board shall consider—

(1) to what extent, if any, the effective management of the affairs of such organization is conducted by one or more individuals who are, or within three [13a] years have been, (A) members, agents, or representatives of any Communist organization, and Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, with knowledge of the nature and purpose thereof, or (B) engaged in giving aid or support to any such organization, government, or movement with knowledge of the nature and purpose thereof;

(2) to what extent, if any, the policies of such organization are, or within three years have been, formulated and carried out pursuant to the direction or advice of any member, agent, or representative of any such organization, government, or movement;

(3) to what extent, if any, the personnel and resources of such organization are, or within three years have been, used to further or promote the objectives of any such Communist organization, government, or movement;

(4) to what extent, if any, such organization within three years has received from, or furnished to or for the use of, any such Communist organization, government, or movement any funds or other material assistance;

[13a] Changed from two to three years by P. L. 173, 84th Cong., 1st Sess., July 26, 1955.

(5) to what extent, if any, such organization is, or within three years has been, affiliated in any way with any such Communist organization, government, or movement;

(6) to what extent, if any, the affiliation of such organization, or of any individual or individuals who are members thereof or who manage its affairs, with any such Communist organization, government, or movement is concealed from or is not disclosed to the membership of such organization; and

(7) to what extent, if any, such organization or any of its members or managers are, or within three years have been, knowingly engaged—

(A) in any conduct punishable under section 4 or 15 of this Act or under chapter 37, 105, or 115 of title 18 of the United States Code; or

(B) with intent to impair the military strength of the United States or its industrial capacity to furnish logistical or other support required by its armed forces, in any activity resulting in or contributing to any such impairment.

(f) After hearing upon any petition filed under this section, the Board shall (1) make a report in writing in which it shall state findings as to the facts and its conclusion with respect to the issues presented by such petition, (2) enter its order granting or denying the determination sought by such petition, and (3) serve upon each party to the proceeding a copy of such order. Any order granting any determination on the question whether any organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization shall become final as provided in section 14(b) of this Act.

(g) When any order has been entered by the Board under this section with respect to any labor organization or employer (as these terms are defined by section 2 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and which are organizations within the meaning of section 3 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950), the Board shall serve a true and correct copy of such order upon the National Labor Relations Board and shall publish in the Federal Register a statement of the substance of such order and its effective date.

(h) When there is in effect a final order of the Board determining that any such labor organization is a Communist-action organization, a Communist-front organization, or a Communist-infiltrated organization, such labor organization shall be ineligible to—

(1) act as representative of any employee within the meaning or for the purposes of section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (29 U. S. C. 157);

(2) serve as an exclusive representative of employees of any bargaining unit under section 9 of such Act, as amended (29 U. S. C. 159);

(3) make, or obtain any hearing upon, any charge under section 10 of such Act (29 U. S. C. 160); or

(4) exercise any other right or privilege, or receive any other benefit, substantive or procedural, provided by such Act for labor organizations.

(i) When an order of the Board determining that any such labor organization is a Communist-infiltrated organization has become final, and such labor organization theretofore has been certified under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, as a representative of employees in any bargaining unit—

(1) a question of representation affecting commerce, within the meaning of section 9(c) of such Act, shall be deemed to exist with respect to such bargaining unit; and

(2) the National Labor Relations Board, upon petition of not less than 20 per centum of the employees in such bargaining unit or any person or persons acting in their behalf, shall under section 9 of such Act (notwithstanding any limitation of time contained therein) direct elections in such bargaining unit or any subdivision thereof (A) for the selection of a representative thereof for collective bargaining purposes, and (B) to determine whether the employees thereof desire to rescind any authority previously granted to such labor organization to enter into any agreement with their employer pursuant to section 8(a) (3)(ii) of such Act.

(j) When there is in effect a final order of the Board determining that any such employer is a Communist-infiltrated organization, such employer shall be ineligible to—

(1) file any petition for an election under section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (29 U. S. C. 157), or participate in any proceeding under such section; or

(2) make or obtain any hearing upon any charge under section 10 of such Act (29 U. S. C. 160); or

(3) exercise any other right or privilege or receive any other benefit, substantive or procedural, provided by such Act for employers.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

SEC. 14. (a) The party aggrieved by any order entered by the Board under subsection (g), (h), (i), or (j) of section 13, or subsection [14] (f) of section 13A, may obtain a review of such order by filing in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, within sixty days from the date of service upon it of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Board be set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Board, and thereupon the Board shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, including all evidence taken and the report and order of the Board. Thereupon the court shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and shall have power to affirm or set aside the order of the Board; but the court may in its discretion and upon its own motion transfer any action so commenced to the United States Court of Appeals for the circuit wherein the petitioner resides. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by the preponderance of the evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board and to be adduced upon the proceeding in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Board may modify its findings as to the facts, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by the preponderance of the evidence shall be conclusive, and its recommendations, if any, with respect to action in the matter under consideration. If the court shall set aside an order issued under subsection (j) of section 13 it may, in the case of an organization, enter a judgment canceling the registration of such organization and relieving it from the requirement of further annual reports, or in the case of an individual, enter a judgment requiring the Attorney General (A) to strike the name of such individual from the registration statement or annual report on which it appears, or (B) cancel the registration of such individual under section 8, as may be appropriate. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari, as provided in title 28, United States Code, section 1254.

(b) Any order of the Board issued under section 13, or subsection (f) of section 13A,[15] shall become final—

(1) upon the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for review, if no such petition has been duly filed within such time; or

(2) upon the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for certiorari, if the order of the Board has been affirmed or the petition for review dismissed by a United States Court of Appeals, and no petition for certiorari has been duly filed; or

(3) upon the denial of a petition for certiorari, if the order of the Board has been affirmed or the petition for review dismissed by a United States Court of Appeals; or

(4) upon the expiration of ten days from the date of issuance of the mandate of the Supreme Court, if such Court directs that the order of the Board be affirmed or the petition for review dismissed.

PENALTIES

SEC. 15. (a) If there is in effect with respect to any organization or individual a final order of the Board requiring registration under section 7 or section 8 of this title—

(1) such organization shall, upon conviction of failure to register, to file any registration statement or annual report, or to keep records as required by section 7, be punished for each such offense by a fine of not more than $10,000, and

(2) each individual having a duty under subsection (h) of section 7 to register or to file any registration statement or annual report on behalf of such organization, and each individual having a duty to register under section 8, shall, upon conviction of failure to so register or to file any such registration statement or annual report, be punished for each such offense by a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

For the purposes of this subsection, each day of failure to register, whether on the part of the organization or any individual, shall constitute a separate offense.

(b) Any individual who, in a registration statement or annual report filed under section 7 or section 8, willfully makes any false statement or willfully omits to state any fact which is required to be stated, or which is necessary to make the statements made or information given not misleading, shall upon conviction thereof be punished for each such offense by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment. For the purposes of this subsection—

(1) each false statement willfully made, and each willful omission to state any fact which is required to be stated, or which is necessary to make the statements made or information given not misleading, shall constitute a separate offense; and

(2) each listing of the name or address of any one individual shall be deemed to be a separate statement.

(c) Any organization which violates any provision of section 10 of this title shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each such violation by a fine of not more than $10,000. Any individual who violates any provision of section 5, 6, or 10 of this title shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each such violation by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

APPLICABILITY OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

SEC. 16. Nothing in this title shall be held to make the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act inapplicable to the exercise of functions, or the conduct of proceedings, by the Board under this title.

EXISTING CRIMINAL STATUTES

SEC. 17. The foregoing provisions of this title shall be construed as being in addition to and not in modification of existing criminal statutes.

2. Immigration and Nationality Act

Pertinent provisions of sections 22 and 25 of the Subversive Activities Control Act have been carried forward in the Immigration and Nationality Act, 66 Stat. 163, adopted June 27, 1952, 8 U. S. C. secs. 1182, 1251, 1424, 1451, as follows:

SEC. 212. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the following classes of aliens shall be ineligible to receive visas and shall be excluded from admission into the United States:

* * * * * * *

(28) Aliens who are, or at any time have been, members of any of the following classes:

* * * * * * *

(E) Aliens not within any of the other provisions of this paragraph, who are members of or affiliated with any organization during the time it is registered or required to be registered under section 7 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, unless such aliens establish that they did not have knowledge or reason to believe at the time they became members of or affiliated with such an organization (and did not thereafter and prior to the date upon which such organization was so registered or so required to be registered have such knowledge or reason to believe) that such organization was a Communist organization.

SEC. 241. (a) Any alien in the United States (including any alien crewman) shall, upon the order of the Attorney General, be deported who—

* * * * * * *

(6) is or at any time has been, after entry, a member of any of the following classes of aliens:

* * * * * * *

(E) Aliens not within any of the other provisions of this paragraph, who are members of or affiliated with any organization during the time it is registered or required to be registered under section 7 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, unless such aliens establish that they did not have knowledge or reason to believe at the time they became members of or affiliated with such organization (and did not thereafter and prior to the date upon which such organization was so registered or so required to be registered have such knowledge or reason to believe) that such organization was a Communist organization.

SEC. 313. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 405(b), no person shall hereafter be naturalized as a citizen of the United States—

(2) . . . (G) who, regardless of whether he is within any of the other provisions of this section, is a member of or affiliated with any Communist-action organization during the time it is registered or required to be registered under the provisions of section 7 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950; or (H) who, regardless of whether he is within any of the other provisions of this section, is a member of or affiliated with any Communist-front organization during the time it is registered or required to be registered under section 7 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, unless such alien establishes that he did not have knowledge or reason to believe at the time he became a member of or affiliated with such an organization (and did not thereafter and prior to the date upon which such organization was so registered or so required to be registered have such knowledge or reason to believe) that such organization was a Communist-front organization.

SEC. 340. * * * (c) If a person who shall have been naturalized after the effective date of this Act [16] shall within five years next following such naturalization become a member of or affiliated with any organization, membership in or affiliation with which at the time of naturalization would have precluded such person from naturalization under the provisions of section 313, it shall be considered prima facie evidence that such person was not attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States and was not well disposed to the good order and happiness of the United States at the time of naturalization, and, in the absence of countervailing evidence, it shall be sufficient in the proper proceeding to authorize the revocation and setting aside of the order admitting such person to citizenship and the cancellation of the certificate of naturalization as having been obtained by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation, and such revocation and setting aside of the order admitting such person to citizenship and such canceling of certificate of naturalization shall be effective as of the original date of the order and certificate, respectively.

3. Communist Control Act

The Communist Control Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 775, 50 U. S. C. 841-44, provides in part as follows:

FINDINGS OF FACT

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby finds and declares that the Communist Party of the United States, although purportedly a political party, is in fact an instrumentality of a conspiracy to overthrow the Government of the United States. It constitutes an authoritarian dictatorship within a republic, demanding for itself the rights and privileges accorded to political parties, but denying to all others the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution. Unlike political parties, which evolve their policies and programs through public means, by the reconciliation of a wide variety of individual views, and submit those policies and programs to the electorate at large for approval or disapproval, the policies and programs of the Communist Party are secretly prescribed for it by the foreign leaders of the world Communist movement. Its members have no part in determining its goals, and are not permitted to voice dissent to party objectives. Unlike members of political parties, members of the Communist Party are recruited for indoctrination with respect to its objectives and methods, and are organized, instructed, and disciplined to carry into action slavishly the assignments given them by their hierarchical chieftains. Unlike political parties, the Communist Party acknowledges no constitutional or statutory limitations upon its conduct or upon that of its members. The Communist Party is relatively small numerically, and gives scant indication of capacity ever to attain its ends by lawful political means. The peril inherent in its operation arises not from its numbers, but from its failure to acknowledge any limitation as to the nature of its activities, and its dedication to the proposition that the present constitutional Government of the United States ultimately must be brought to ruin by any available means, including resort to force and violence. Holding that doctrine, its role as the agency of a hostile foreign power renders its existence a clear present and continuing danger to the security of the United States. It is the means whereby individuals are seduced into the service of the world Communist movement, trained to do its bidding, and directed and controlled in the conspiratorial performance of their revolutionary services. Therefore, the Communist Party should be outlawed.

PROSCRIBED ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 3. The Communist Party of the United States, or any successors of such party regardless of the assumed name, whose object or purpose is to overthrow the Government of the United States, or the government of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, or the government of any political subdivision therein by force and violence, are not entitled to any of the rights, privileges, and immunities attendant upon legal bodies created under the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States or any political subdivision thereof; and whatever rights, privileges, and immunities which have heretofore been granted to said party or any subsidiary organization by reason of the laws of the United States or any political subdivision thereof, are hereby terminated: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall be construed as amending the Internal Security Act of 1950, as amended.

SEC. 4. Whoever knowingly and willfully becomes or remains a member of (1) the Communist Party, or (2) any other organization having for one of its purposes or objectives the establishment, control, conduct, seizure, or overthrow of the Government of the United States, or the government of any State or political subdivision thereof, by the use of force or violence, with knowledge of the purpose or objective of such organization shall be subject to all the provisions and penalties of the Internal Security Act of 1950, as amended, as a member of a "Communist-action" organization.

(b) For the purposes of this section, the term "Communist Party" means the organization now known as the Communist Party of the United States of America, the Communist Party of any State or subdivision thereof, and any unit or subdivision of any such organization, whether or not any change is hereafter made in the name thereof.

SEC. 5. In determining membership or participation in the Communist Party or any other organization defined in this Act, or knowledge of the purpose or objective of such party or organization, the jury, under instructions from the court, shall consider evidence, if presented, as to whether the accused person:

(1) Has been listed to his knowledge as a member in any book or any of the lists, records, correspondence, or any other document of the organization;

(2) Has made financial contribution to the organization in dues, assessments, loans, or in any other form;

(3) Has made himself subject to the discipline of the organization in any form whatsoever;

(4) Has executed orders, plans, or directives of any kind of the organization;

(5) Has acted as an agent, courier, messenger, correspondent, organizer, or in any other capacity in behalf of the organization;

(6) Has conferred with officers or other members of the organization in behalf of any plan or enterprise of the organization;

(7) Has been accepted to his knowledge as an officer or member of the organization or as one to be called upon for services by other officers or members of the organization;

(8) Has written, spoken or in any other way communicated by signal, semaphore, sign, or in any other form of communication orders, directives, or plans of the organization;

(9) Has prepared documents, pamphlets, leaflets, books, or any other type of publication in behalf of the objectives and purposes of the organization;

(10) Has mailed, shipped, circulated, distributed, delivered, or in any other way sent or delivered to others material or propaganda of any kind in behalf of the organization;

(11) Has advised, counseled or in any other way imparted information, suggestions, recommendations to officers or members of the organization or to anyone else in behalf of the objectives of the organization;

(12) Has indicated by word, action, conduct, writing or in any other way a willingness to carry out in any manner and to any degree the plans, designs, objectives, or purposes of the organization;

(13) Has in any other way participated in the activities, planning, actions, objectives, or purposes of the organization;

(14) The enumeration of the above subjects of evidence on membership or participation in the Communist Party or any other organization as above defined, shall not limit the inquiry into and consideration of any other subject of evidence on membership and participation as herein stated.

* * * * * * [17]

SEC. 12. If any provision of this title or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the title, and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

REPLY BRIEF FOR PETITIONER

I. The First Amendment

A

In our principal brief we pointed out that one of the First Amendment vices of the Act is that it is not limited to, and is unnecessary for, the elimination of any evil which Congress has the power to control. The Act, as we showed, suppresses petitioner as a whole, and with it petitioner's admittedly extensive peaceable advocacy and assembly (Pet. Br. 26-33, 91-107).

The respondent does not contest our demonstration that the Act is and was intended to be an outlawry statute. Nor does it dispute our legal argument that an outlawry statute is invalid.

Again, respondent does not attempt to meet our argument that the clear and present danger exception has no application to the Act, and that the section 2 finding of such a danger is immaterial (Pet. Br. 96-97). Yet it proceeds as if it had refuted the argument. The whole thrust of respondent's brief is that the Act is valid because Communism is a great danger, or at least that Congress said so (Br. 94-97). The respondent's thesis comes down to the untenable proposition that if there is a danger (or even if Congress merely has declared one), Congress may hurl an H-bomb on its general direction, on the "reasonable" theory that no matter what else is slaughtered the peril will be eliminated.

Another point with which the respondent does not cope is our demonstration that the Act, and to an even greater extent the Board's order and the affirmance below, violate the First Amendment because they impose the destructive registration requirement and intolerable sanctions on the basis of beliefs and protected expression (Pet. Br. 113-19, 170-74). The respondent makes no effort to refute either our analysis or the legal conclusions which we drew therefrom.

The respondent's First Amendment discussion of the registration provisions is vitiated by its untenable assimilation of the Act to non-invidious and non-discriminatory genuine disclosure statutes. The respondent ignores the defamatory nature of registration under the Act,[1] the onerous sanctions imposed on those called upon to register, and the likelihood of criminal prosecution of any who do register. These features make disclosure by registration impossible. They also demonstrate that it was never intended, as does the fact that disclosure is not an adequate or appropriate remedy for espionage, sabotage, seditious advocacy, and the other evils claimed to justify the Act, all of which are punishable under existing criminal legislation.

[1] John Lord O'Brian, recently observed in a Godkin Lecture at Harvard: "Defamation, historically the most foul of all weapons used to impair integrity, has become a commonplace of reckless usage both in governmental proceedings and in the comment of the general public." O'Brian, National Security and Individual Freedom (1955), 65.

Respondent's discussion isolates the registration requirements of the Act from the sanctions, apparently in recognition of the fact that the sanctions are incompatible with respondent's assumption that the Act is merely a disclosure statute. For the same reason, respondent repeatedly suggests that the Court disregard the sanctions in this litigation (Br. 42, 88-9, 163-64). This suggestion was more strongly urged by respondent in the court below, which rejected it (R. 2081-84). The suggestion is clearly unsound.

The Act provides that once a registration order becomes final, two sets of consequences follow automatically. First, the organization and its officers are under a duty, enforceable by criminal penalties, to file a registration statement. Second, the organization and its members incur onerous disabilities and liabilities. The latter penalties are not imposed for failure to register, but are operative whether the organization registers or not. No further action is required to put them into effect. Like the registration requirement, they are direct and immediate consequences of the order, written into it by the Act. It was an immaterial matter of draftsmanship that Congress attached these consequences to the order by force of the Act, instead of directing the Board to write them into the order, as in the case of the registration requirement.

The registration order thus fires a double-barrel shot gun against petitioner. It is disingenuous to suggest that, in examining the consequences of the order, the Court should disregard the shot from one barrel and the wounds it inflicts. It is manifestly impossible to make an intelligent determination of the constitutionality of the order without considering all of the sanctions which it automatically invokes.

The respondent distinguishes Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, on the ground that it involved "no problem of sedition, subversion" or foreign control (Br. 101). The principle of Thomas v. Collins is that registration may not be made a condition of the right to make a lawful speech. The Board's argument recognizes that the Act violates this principle, but suggests extenuating factors. We think, however, that it is an untenable assumption that the Court would have decided Thomas v. Collins otherwise if the state had had some reason to believe that Thomas was a security risk or a foreign agent. So long as his speech would not endanger security, his right to make it could not validly be conditioned on registration, no matter what his general character might be.

The fact that speech cannot be abridged on the basis of the identity or character of the speaker is established by DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353. It held that a person could not be prevented from making a lawful speech merely because, as the Court assumed, he and his organization were security risks (Pet. Br. 114, 93, 97; see also Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242). The Board distinguishes DeJonge on the grounds that "There the disability imposed was criminal punishment * * *, not the much milder form of 'restraint' in the form of registration and disclosure requirements" (Br. 101). But in the first place, the registration requirements of the Act and their attendant sanctions are not mild restraints, being at least as onerous as most criminal penalties. Secondly, DeJonge did not rest on the factor of criminal punishment. Its thesis, which applies to civil as well as criminal sanctions, was stated as follows (at 364-65):

> "These [First Amendment] rights may be abused by using speech or press or assembly in order to incite to violence and crime. The people through their legislatures may protect themselves against that abuse. But the legislative intervention can find constitutional justification only by dealing with the abuse."

The impermissible theory of the Act that all of an organization's advocacy can be proscribed once the organization is governmentally branded is epitomized by the requirement (sec. 7(d)(6)) that the registration statement list all printing and duplicating equipment (Pet. Br. 142). Respondent makes no effort to defend the validity of this provision, but ignores it altogether.

The respondent asserts that the Act's invidious labelling requirement "imposes no censorship" because the content of the matter mailed or broadcast "is immaterial" (Br. 166). But obviously a restraint of expression regardless of content is a more flagrant abridgment of speech and press than a limitation of content. It is only on the basis of content (as where there is obscenity, fraud, or matter creating a clear and present danger of insurrection) that Congress has any power to inhibit speech and press (Pet. Br. 105-07).[18]

There being available no justification based on content, the respondent argues that the invidious label may be required so that the public may be informed of petitioner's alleged ulterior motives (Br. 168-69). The respondent's argument throws overboard the principle that the clear and present danger exception is the only qualification of the First Amendment's unequivocal command. Never before so far as we are aware, has it even been suggested that [18] Cf. President Eisenhower's advice to the Dartmouth graduates of 1953: "Don't join the book burners. * * * Don't be afraid to go in your library and read every book as long as any document does not offend our own ideas of decency. That should be the only censorship. How will we defeat communism unless we know what it is? What it teaches—why does it have such an appeal for men? * * * Now we have got to fight it with something better. Not try to conceal the thinking of our own people. They are part of America and even if they think ideas that are contrary to ours they have a right to have them, a right to record them and a right to have them in places where they are accessible to others. It is unquestioned or it is not America." N. Y. Times, June 15, 1953.

Congress may restrain speech which threatens no substantive evil because of the suspected motives of the speaker. If such a power is held to exist, then the First Amendment will lose its significance.

Contrary to respondent's argument, Congress has no power to "protect" the population by "exposing" the ulterior motives of those who address the public. In this area the people must protect themselves without the guardianship of the legislature. We believe that the amicus brief of the American Civil Liberties Union is correct in stating (24-5):

> "Certainly, knowledge of whether a person is a Communist, or of his various motivations, biases, and preconceptions may be valuable in appraising the validity of his ideas, and the benefit of associating with him. But in a democracy, the function of obtaining or using this knowledge cannot be transferred from the hands of the citizen to the Government. As Mr. Justice Jackson said in a succinct statement of democratic faith: 'It is not the function of our Government to keep the citizen from falling into error.'"

D

The respondent justifies the Act's sanctions by the argument that they are reasonable exercises of Congressional power in areas within the federal jurisdiction. If this were true, the sanctions would meet the test of due process, but not necessarily the more stringent clear and present danger test of the First Amendment (Pet. Br. 100-01). Respondent overlooks the fact that the member sanctions must be justified under First Amendment standards because they are imposed solely for the exercise of and heavily deter the right of association.

The fact is, however, that the Act's sanctions do not even satisfy the reasonableness requirement of due process. They are reasonable only on the respondent's H-bomb theory of Congressional power.

Thus the Respondent argues that since Congress can protect the mails and broadcast channels against fraudulent communications, it can "protect" them against non-fraudulent communications of petitioner or other unpopular organizations. Since Congress can compel non-invidious identification of broadcast sponsors, it can require petitioner and other unpopular organizations to defame themselves in their broadcasts. Since Congress can forbid federal employees from engaging in partisan politics, it can forbid them and employees of private "defense facilities" from making contributions to petitioner and other unpopular organizations for legitimate uses which have nothing to do with partisan politics. Since Congress can guard defense facilities against sabotage and espionage, it can exclude from employment at such facilities members of petitioner and other proscribed organizations even if they have no desire, tendency, or opportunity to engage in sabotage and espionage. Since Douds held (we think incorrectly) that Congress can, as a means of preventing political strikes affecting interstate commerce, put pressure on unions to remove Communists from leadership positions, it can prohibit Communists and members of other proscribed organizations from holding non-leadership union employment having nothing to do with strike policy or interstate commerce.[2] Since Congress can prevent persons from travelling abroad to commit espionage, it can prevent Communists and members of other proscribed organizations from travelling abroad for such innocuous purposes as collecting a legacy, studying ancient ruins, or comforting a dying parent. Since Congress can revoke naturalizations obtained by fraud, it can revoke naturalizations by inventing an irrational presumption of fraud (Rep. Br. 164-99). None of this is good law.

[2] Respondent contends that we were in error in stating (Pet. Br. 103) that section 5(a)(1)(E) does not purport to be an exercise of the commerce power. It asserts that "the paragraph is limited to the holding of office in or employment with labor organizations as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, the scope of which in turn is limited by the commerce clause" (Resp. Br. 192). Respondent's assertion is incorrect. The definition of "labor organization" in the latter statute (28 U. S. C. 152(6)) is made without reference to interstate commerce, the commerce restriction in that statute being elsewhere.

What the respondent's theory comes down to is that all members of proscribed organizations (including the huge number of "members" of petitioner artificially created by section 5 of the Communist Control Act) may be conclusively presumed to be criminals and deprived, without hearings for the individual or other ado, of any privileges Congress wishes to withhold. This is simply the McCarthy theory that the Constitution does not apply to Communists and people he calls Communists.

II. The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

In our principal brief (83) we urged that the Act and the registration order are invalid because they compel petitioner's officers to incriminate themselves by performing an act—the signing and filing of petitioner's registration statement—which constitutes an admission of their membership in petitioner and "a knowledge of its workings."[3]

The respondent contends (Br. 104-12) that adjudication of this issue is premature in this proceeding. It urges, first, that the privilege may never be asserted by the officers, and that those officers who desire to assert the privilege can do so on the registration form to be filed with the Attorney General.

This argument overlooks the crucial fact that the assertion of the privilege to the Attorney General is itself an incriminating admission that the persons asserting it are officers of the petitioner (Pet. Br. 87-88). The opportunity for claiming the privilege which respondent proposes is simply an opportunity for the officers to incriminate themselves. The procedure suggested by the respondent would confront the officers with an illusory alternative: to make the incriminating admission that they are officers of the organization by signing and filing the registration statement, or to make the same admission by asserting the privilege not to sign and file the statement.

The officers of petitioner must somewhere be able to obtain judicial protection against the requirement of the registration order that they make the incriminating disclosure that they are petitioner's officers. Since an assertion of the privilege by them, under the circumstances of the case, would surrender the privilege, the assertion cannot be a prerequisite to adjudication of their rights. This proceeding provides the only opportunity they have to secure the benefit of the privilege.[4] Hence the issue is not premature.

Respondent also contends that the privilege issue is premature because a claim of privilege, if and when asserted, might be found to have been waived by certain of petitioner's officers because of facts peculiar to their individual situations.[5] This argument has the same vice as the contention that the issue is premature because the officers might not claim the privilege at all. The point is that the Act allows no effective opportunity for the officers to claim the privilege. Hence it is impossible to withhold adjudication until the claim is made or until, having been made, it is determined whether the claimant had waived the privilege. No one knows who will be the officers of petitioner at the time when it becomes necessary to file a registration statement. They may well be, or include, persons whose right to the privilege will not be complicated by any question of waiver. Yet if the Court abstains from deciding the privilege issue now because of some speculative possibility of waiver, the last opportunity for protecting the constitutional privilege of these persons will have gone by. In short, adjudication cannot await disposition of an issue which could only arise on assertion of the privilege, because the Act allows no opportunity for the assertion.

[4] It cannot be urged that the officers can enjoy the protection of the privilege by remaining silent until indicted for failure to file a registration statement. For, as the respondent acknowledges (Br. 109), the privilege is a protection against prosecution as well as conviction.

[5] Respondent's argument is made in disregard of the well-settled proposition that the privilege is not waived by prior admissions made extra-judicially, or in another proceeding, or even at a different stage of the same proceeding (Pet. Br. 89).

The respondent's refusal to recognize that, in the setting of the registration order, an assertion of the privilege is itself incriminating blinds it to the applicability of Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, which held a federal statute invalid on its face, because it conflicted with the privilege against self-incrimination. Boyd decisively refutes all of respondent's arguments.

As the respondent points out, the statute considered in Boyd presented a suspected tax evader with the alternative of (1) producing his books to refute the charges against him or (2) suffering the charges to be taken as confessed. The respondent states that, "In the context of such a statute, a claim of privilege would have been quite meaningless." It was for this reason, as respondent observes, that the Court voided the statute without reference to the doctrine that the privilege must be asserted if it is to be availed of (Br. 114-5). For the same reason, the Court did not permit the statute to survive for application to future cases in which the privilege might have been waived.

The "alternative" which confronts an officer of petitioner under a registration order is no more satisfactory than that in Boyd. The officer must choose between making an incriminating admission by signing a registration statement and making the same admission by claiming his privilege not to sign the statement. Here an assertion of the privilege would be worse than "quite meaningless." It would itself be incriminating. Hence, as in Boyd, the principle that the privilege must be claimed in order to be relied upon is inapplicable.

The respondent's blind spot also appears in its argument that, "Even assuming that a claim of privilege will be made and must be honored, this would make the order to register at most unenforceable, not void" (Br. 112). This argument proceeds on the same fallacious premise that petitioner's officers must claim the privilege in order to have it honored. As we have seen, however, there is no place other than this proceeding in which their privilege can "be honored." And the only way in which that can be accomplished in this proceeding is by holding the registration order invalid.[6]

The situation here is identical with that presented in Boyd where, as respondent states (Br. 116), "The statute was held void as necessarily conflicting with the privilege." The Act and the registration order must be held void for the same reason.

The respondent's final contention is that, on the authority of United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694, the privilege is not available to petitioner's officers (Br. 117-21). Respondent's brief ignores one of the crucial factors which distinguishes the situation here from that in White. White relaxed the Fifth Amendment only to the extent of holding that the officer of an organization is not privileged to withhold records of the organization on the ground that their contents might incriminate him. Here, it is not the contents of the records but the identification of the person signing the statement as an officer and member of petitioner which is incriminating. Such self-identification cannot be compelled (Pet. Br. 83, 86-7).

[6] Moreover, as Boyd shows, a statute which on its face violates a constitutional right is void notwithstanding the possibility that it may have a valid application to hypothetical persons under speculative conditions.

The second vital distinction is that White involved the bare act of producing the records of the organization, while a registration order requires the officers to prepare and file an original statement (Pet. Br. 84-6). The respondent's argument that there is no significant difference between the two requirements (Br. 117-21) contradicts the Court's expressions in White, Wilson v. United States, 221 U. S. 361, and Shapiro v. United States, 335 U. S. 1, and does violence to the principle of the Fifth Amendment (Pet. Br. 84-85).

III. The Act and Due Process

A. The Act as Fiat Legislation

Under the section 3(3) definition, there can be a Communist-action organization only if there is a world Communist movement as defined by section 2. The Act, however, does not leave the existence of such a movement open to administrative or judicial determination. The legislative findings as to the existence, nature, and control of the world Communist movement are binding on the Board and the courts, and the court below so held (R. 2132-3). Accordingly, the Act violates due process since it predetermines, by legislative fiat, facts essential to guilt (Pet. Br. 56-59).

The respondent acknowledges that the existence of a world Communist movement as described in section 2 is not "subject to litigation in a particular proceeding under the Act" (Br. 127-8). Simultaneously, it recognizes that the existence of the world Communist movement is crucial to making the Act "operative against petitioner" (Br. 125). It contends on two grounds that this legislative predetermination of crucial facts does not violate due process.

First it argues that the section 3(3) definition contains two components, both of which "must be fulfilled for the definition to apply" (Br. 124). This is beside the point. Both components of section 3(3) presuppose the existence of the world Communist movement described in section 2, and neither can possibly apply if such a movement does not exist. The vice of the Act is that the necessary factual foundation for both components is determined by legislative fiat.

Secondly, the Board argues that the existence and nature of the world Communist movement are legislative facts, "general conclusions which support the policy of a particular law," and not adjudicative facts, "which, on proof in adversary litigation, bring a specific person or organization within the purview of the legislation, or otherwise make the general terms of the legislation specifically applicable" (Br. 126).

The findings in section 2 were, of course, intended to "support the policy of" the "particular law." The difficulty, however, is that Congress did not stop there. Instead, it made liability under the Act dependent on the existence of "facts" which are only found legislatively. It did this by incorporating in section 3(3) the findings of section 2 as assumptions of fact which must be accepted by the Board and reviewing courts.

As the analysis in our principal brief showed (58), and as elementary common sense demonstrates, the existence of a world Communist movement as defined in section 2 is an indispensable factual element to a conclusion that a particular organization, (1) is controlled by the government or organization which controls that movement, and (2) operates to advance the objectives of that movement. Accordingly, the existence of such a movement is a fact necessary to bring an organization "within the purview of the legislation" and to "make the general terms of the legislation specifically applicable." The Board's brief makes no attempt to disprove our analysis and offers no counter analysis of its own. It merely offers the ipse dixit that the existence of a world Communist movement is not an adjudicative fact.

The hypothetical analogy suggested by the Board (Br. 128, ftn. 33) does not help its case. If indeed Congress should enact legislation authorizing an administrative agency to prohibit types of business activity found on the basis of evidence to deepen "the" world-wide economic depression, due process would require that a company involved in a proceeding before the agency be permitted to prove that there was in fact no depression which its activities could deepen. What impresses the Board about this analogy is the inefficiency of a system which would permit countless businesses to relitigate the same basic question. But the point is that Congress does not legislate such gaucheries. When Congress enacts economic legislation to alleviate a depression, it does not make the existence of a depression the foundation of the administrative findings, even though it may be the reason for the enactment. Instead, it authorizes the administrative agency to make findings as to whether certain practices deemed harmful by Congress are being employed, such as unfair competition, wage cutting, price-cutting, etc.[7]

It is only in the Act that Congress has incorporated legislative findings into the ultimate standards to be applied by the administrative agency. It is only in the Act that an element essential to the determination of liability is based on an assumption of facts found by Congress and not subject to administrative or judicial adjudication.

This legislative predetermination was not impelled by a need to avoid such wasteful relitigation as that contemplated by the Board's hypothetical analogy. For Congress intended that only one organization, the petitioner, should be charged as a Communist-action organization. But Congress knew that it had already enacted legislation prohibiting the seditious and insurrectionary conduct described in section two, and requiring foreign agents to register. It also knew that the Attorney General had been unable to make out a case against petitioner under these statutes. The problem to which the authors of the Act addressed themselves was how to dispense with the embarrassing necessity of proving their accusations against petitioner. That is why the Act was passed, and that is why the legislative predetermination of the existence of "the world Communist movement" was incorporated into the operative provisions of the Act (Pet. Br. 35-40).[8]

For the same reason, the authors of the Act also found it necessary to coerce an administrative determination of the other facts essential to guilt. It did this in section 2 by making findings on the identical subjects which were ostensibly to be determined by the Board, even to the point of identifying the petitioner as "the" Communist-action organization (Pet. Br. 42-45). Respondent makes no attempt to defend this aspect of the legislative predetermination.

B. The Irrationality of Section 13(e)

We argued that section 13(e) of the Act authorizes the Board to find that an organization is a Communist-action organization within the section 3(3) definition on the basis of evidentiary criteria which are irrelevant to the definition. Thus the Act permitted the Board to find petitioner guilty of one thing on proof of another, in plain violation of due process (Pet. Br. 46-53, 64-69).

The respondent's over-all reply to our contention is that the inquiry as to the relevancy of the standards of section 13(e) to the 3(3) definition is unimportant (Respt. Br. 132-34). It asserts that 13(e) does not supply "tests or criteria" of a Communist-action organization, but merely "relevant considerations or guides to the consideration of evidence bearing upon the question." The "sole and exclusive test," it insists, is supplied by section 3(3). (Br. 132-33.) But this contention is merely an exercise in semantics, since "considerations or guides" are "tests or criteria," and the question is whether they are "relevant." Section 3(3) cannot be the "exclusive" test since Congress saw fit to enact 13(e) and to provide that in reaching its determination the Board should take into account the items listed in that section.

The respondent also urges (ibid.) that section 13(e) cannot invalidate the Act because its standards are not exclusive and do not preclude the Board from considering other factors relevant to the definition. The argument ignores the holding in Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219 (Pet. Br. 66), that a statute which authorizes a judgment to be reached on irrational premises is invalid on its face notwithstanding that the trier of fact may base its judgment on rational premises. Respondent also ignores the elementary logic that if any one of the propositions on which a conclusion is based is invalid, the conclusion has not been demonstrated to be valid.[9]

Furthermore, if the respondent's argument could rescue the Act, it would invalidate the order of the Board. For it appears from the face of the Report (R. 1-137) that the Board rested its order solely upon its findings under the eight criteria of section 13(e). The Report examines each criterion separately, makes a finding adverse to petitioner under each, and concludes, without more, that petitioner is a Communist-action organization. Nowhere does the Report consider the evidence apart from its relevance to the criteria, or attempt to relate the evidence to the ultimate facts set forth in the section 3(3) definition.[10] Accordingly, if the respondent is correct in its present contention that the Board was required to consider factors in addition to those enumerated in 13(e) and that section 3(3) provides the exclusive criteria for Board consideration, the order must be set aside for the failure to meet this requirement.

Respondent intimates (Br. 134) that it is unnecessary to determine whether the criteria are relevant to the definition for the further reason that almost everybody (including the Court) knows that petitioner is a Communist-action organization, and hence that a trial of that question is an unimportant formality. The suggestion is that because petitioner might be found guilty in a public opinion poll, no proof was required.

The respondent is driven to these lengths in its efforts to by-pass consideration of the 13(e) criteria because its defense of the criteria is plainly unavailing.

1. We showed that section 13(e) cannot supply a rational basis for decision because none of its criteria is relevant to the "objectives" component of the section 3(3) definition—i.e., that the accused organization operates primarily to advance the objective of overthrowing the [10] The case was presented by the Attorney General and tried by the hearing panel on the same theory of the function of section 13(e). The petition, after an introductory section, is divided into eight separate parts corresponding to the eight criteria of section 13(e) (R. 143-59). All of the petition's allegations were subsumed under, and pleaded as relevant to, one or another of the eight criteria. The hearing panel, with the acquiescence of the Attorney General, required the latter to indicate the particular criteria under which he was offering particular lines of evidence. This requirement was made and agreed to on the theory that section 13(e) provided an exclusive standard of relevance, and that evidence not relevant to one or more of the criteria was inadmissible (see, e.g., Tr. 2444-45; 3133; 3202; 3795-96; 3804). Neither the Attorney General nor the panel took the position that evidence irrelevant to any of the eight criteria was, nevertheless, admissible as relevant to the ultimate facts to be established.

Government by violence or other illegal means and replacing it by a foreign-controlled dictatorship. (Pet. Br. 46).

It appears from the respondent's own analysis of section 13(e) that seven of the eight criteria do not relate to the "objectives" component of the definition but, at most, are relevant only to "foreign domination and control" (Resp. Br. 134-50). The respondent does argue that the first criterion ("directives and policies") is relevant to the objectives component. It urges that consideration of "the extent to which [the accused organization's] policies are formulated and carried out * * * to effectuate the policies of the foreign government or foreign organization" referred to in section 2 requires consideration of the policies of the foreign government as a whole. It says that, "These would certainly include at least those major objectives referred to in §2 as presenting a clear and present danger to the security of the United States, i.e. * * * the forcible overthrow of the government." (Br. 135-36.)

This analysis is faulty for two reasons.

In the first place, section 13(e)(1) contains two standards which are stated in the disjunctive. The Board is directed to consider the extent to which the organization's policies are made and implemented either (1) pursuant to foreign directives, or (2) to effectuate the policies of the foreign government. Obviously, the first of these alternatives has nothing to do with the content of the organization's policies or objectives, and the respondent does not argue to the contrary. It is only the second alternative which, according to the respondent, is relevant to the issue of seditious objectives. But section 13(e)(1) does not require the Board to consider this alternative. Hence the Board is authorized to find that an accused organization operates to advance the seditious objectives described in section 2 in the absence of evidence which satisfies the only clause of 13(e) that respondent claims has any relevance to such objectives.

Further, the respondent acknowledges that the second alternative of 13(e)(1) requires consideration of the policies of the foreign government as a whole, including "any 'good' objectives—objectives which might 'be shared by' and 'benefit' the United States" (Br. 136). Obviously, however, evidence of these "good" objectives cannot be proof that the organization operates to advance seditious objectives. Therefore the second alternative itself permits consideration of irrelevant evidence.

The correctness of our contention that section 13(e) as a whole has no relevance to the objectives component of the 3(3) definition is confirmed by the position which the respondent urged upon the court below and which the court adopted in its opinion.

The respondent took the position below that it is unnecessary to prove, and that the Act does not require proof, that an accused organization operates to advance the seditious objectives which section 2 attributes to the world Communist movement.[11]

The court below adopted the respondent's then interpretation of the Act. This is established by the excerpts from the opinion quoted by us (Pet. Br. 67) and referred to by respondent (Br. 137-38, ftn. 35). It is clear from these excerpts that the court believed that the "policies" criterion of section 13(e)(1) can be fully satisfied by proof that the accused organization seeks the establishment of a "totalitarian dictatorship" in this country, regardless of the fact that the means used or advocated for the attainment of this objective are entirely peaceable and lawful (see Pet. Br. 68). That this was the position of the court below is further evidenced by the fact that, in affirming the order of the Board, it found it unnecessary to determine whether or not the evidence established that petitioner advocated the violent overthrow of the Government (see Pet. Br., 155-56), an issue which the Board had informed it was not of prime importance and was relevant only to the allegiance criterion.

[11] We called attention to this fact in our principal brief (46), and the respondent does not contradict our statement. In its brief below, the respondent stated (p. 72): "As we have shown, however, the whole theory that underlies the registration features of this Act in relation to a Communist-action organization is that the mere fact of foreign domination justifies Congress in imposing disclosure requirements. Whether the individual foreign controlled policies are good or evil is irrelevant." The respondent added in its brief below (p. 111) that "the advocacy of force and violence is not the prime issue in this proceeding, but * * * is a relevant matter to be considered on the issue of allegiance."

As we have shown, the position taken below by the respondent and adopted by the court was correct. Accordingly, the Act is unconstitutional because it establishes an irrational system of proof. It was the respondent's belated recognition of this fact which forced it to change its position. If the Court should, however, accept respondent's present position, the Board's order must nevertheless be set aside. For in that event, the case was decided by the Board and the court below upon an erroneous interpretation and application of the Act.

2. With respect to the foreign control component of the section 3(3) definition, section 13(e) supplies criteria which, at best, are nebulous, circumstantial and largely irrelevant (Pet. Br., 47-52). The respondent's counter-analysis of the criteria confirms our criticism. Its attempt to rescue the criteria takes two forms.

First, respondent urges that even if each criterion has no tendency to prove foreign control when considered separately, the deficiency is remedied by considering them cumulatively (Br. 134, 146). But the sum of eight zeroes is zero, and the respondent fails to explain how the vacuity of the individual standards is cured in the ensemble.

Second, it argues that while the criteria as written may have little or no relevance to foreign control, this vice can be cured by surrounding each criterion with a series of qualifications and encrusting it with factors which Congress neglected to supply.[12] Thus the respondent concedes that the bare fact of reporting (which is all that section 13(e)(5) involves) may "suggest nothing in the way of control or domination" (Br. 143). Respondent then proceeds to catalogue a long list of "surrounding circumstances," not enumerated in the Act, which it says "might very well indicate" domination and control. Again, respondent acknowledges that the receipt of foreign financial aid (which is all that section 13(e)(3) involves) has little tendency to prove domination of the donee by the donor (Br. 140-41). It agrees with us that the relevant consideration is not the fact of aid, but the terms and conditions on which it is given. Yet respondent fails to explain why Congress enumerated the irrelevant, but omitted the relevant, factor. Similarly, respondent concedes that the fact that members of an organization receive foreign instruction and training has little significance in the absence of evidence that the organization is obliged to or does conform to the teaching in the conduct of its affairs (Br. 142). Yet section 13(e)(6) requires no evidence of the latter.

Respondent interprets the "non-deviation" criterion to require evidence that the "local organization mirrors in each facet of its activities through the years the policies of a foreign state" (R. 139-40). Yet in applying the criterion, the Board and the court below rejected this interpretation (Pet. Br. 137-44). Accordingly, if respondent's present contention is sound, the order of the Board and the decision below were based on an erroneous premise (see infra, pp. 33-35).

The respondent's discussion of the "discipline" and "allegiance" criteria (Resp. Br. 143-44, 147-50) does not meet our objection (Pet. Br. 50-52) that both are irrational because they permit the Board to impute to an organization the disciplinary status or subjective attitudes of some of its officers and members notwithstanding that they may be an unrepresentative minority whose views are not shared by the organization itself.

Respondent concedes that each of the two "purpose" requirements of the "secret practices" criterion involves circular reasoning (Br. 145-46). It urges that the criterion is nevertheless rational because the two requirements are stated in the disjunctive. The argument seems to be that the irrationality of both requirements is cured by virtue of the fact that only one of them need be proved. We cannot fathom this logic.

C. The Necessarily Biased Board

Under the Act, all future business of the Board was dependent on its finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization. A finding in favor to petitioner would (as two chairmen of the Board themselves recognized) have made the Board functus officio and in effect repealed the Act (Pet. Br. 54-56). We argued, therefore, that the Act violated due process by creating a Board which was under irresistible pressure to decide in one direction and which had a personal, official and financial stake in the result (Pet. Br. 70-71).

The respondent does not dispute our analysis of the Act, nor does it discuss the numerous authorities cited by us which demonstrate that the Act therefore violates due process. Instead, it misrepresents our contention as "charging that the structure and scheme of the Act are such that it would be impossible to staff the Board with members who would not enter upon their duties with the intention of violating their oaths of office" (Br. 130). The issue, however, has nothing to do with violations of oaths of office. What due process requires is that the tribunal be free from pressures to decide against a litigant and from an interest in the event. Violation of the oath of office is a standard for impeachment, but is not required for disqualification. Does the Solicitor General assert that when the government moved to disqualify Judge Youngdahl in the Lattimore case, it was charging that he would violate his oath if he continued to sit?

D. The Denial of Due Process to Members

The Act imposes onerous disabilities on individuals solely because of their organizational membership. It conclusively presumes that every member is a loyalty and security risk who must be denied vital privileges, regardless of his lack of personal knowledge of the organization's claimed deleterious nature. In these respects, we argued, the Act violates due process (Pet. Br. 72-5).[13]

The respondent defends the member sanctions on the ground that they apply only to persons who remain members with knowledge or notice that the organization has been condemned after an administrative hearing and judicial review. It scoffs at the notion "that it is not permissible to impose sanctions on a member if he does not agree * * * with the formal finding made by the Board and upheld by the courts" (Br. 203-4).

But the notion is right and respondent is wrong. A person cannot constitutionally be branded and discriminated against as a loyalty and security risk merely because he is so stubborn (as well as courageous and possibly right) as to disagree with an estimate of the Board and the courts. Otherwise he is punished for nothing more than nonconformity.

This is established by Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485. The statute involved in Adler, like the Act, provided for a hearing to the organization and judicial review. Nevertheless, in upholding the statute, the Court stated (at 494-5, emphasis supplied):

> "Membership in a listed organization found to be within the statute and known by the member to be > within the statute is a legislative finding that the member by his membership supports the thing the organization stands for, namely, the overthrow of government by unlawful means. We cannot say that such a finding is contrary to fact or that 'generality of experience' points to a different conclusion. Disqualification follows therefore as a reasonable presumption from such membership and support. Nor is there here a problem of procedural due process. The presumption is not conclusive but arises only in a hearing where the person against whom it may arise has full opportunity to rebut it."

[13] The Act also violates due process because it excludes members from privileges to which loyalty and security considerations are not germane (Pet. Br., 101-05; supra, pp. 7-8).

According to respondent, the only element in the quoted text that is necessary to satisfy due process is that the organization be "found to be within the statute." Its argument eliminates the other two elements which the Court recognized as indispensable—knowledge by the member that the organization is (not was found to be) of the objectionable kind, and an opportunity to the member to rebut the presumption arising from such knowing membership.

Respondent seeks to escape Adler by misinterpreting our reliance on it. We did not contend, as respondent supposes (Br. 205), that Adler requires that the member be permitted to relitigate the character of the organization. What we said (Pet. Br. 73), and what Adler holds, is that a finding that an organization is disloyal cannot, consistently with due process, conclusively establish the "disloyalty" of its members. The members must be allowed an opportunity to rebut any presumption of "disloyalty" arising from membership before sanctions can be imposed upon them. Since the Act provides no such opportunity, it violates due process.[14] [14] The sanctions are invalid for the additional reason that they are imposed on the members notwithstanding the fact that an organization may be found to be a Communist-action organization without proof that it engages in any illicit advocacy or criminal activity whatsoever (see Pet. Br. 46; supra, pp. 17-20). Cf. the statute in Adler where the disqualification of the members was conditioned on a finding that the organization advocated the violent overthrow of the Government.

It is not true, as respondent contends (Br. 204-05), that sanctions for disloyalty may be imposed on a present member without regard to his lack of personal knowledge that the organization has evil purposes. As Adler establishes, scienter is a prerequisite because its presence is necessary to a rational inference of disloyalty from organizational membership. As the Court recognized in Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183, 190, membership in a "subversive" organization "may be innocent in the absence of scienter." The principle which makes scienter necessary applies to present membership as well as to past. Adler considered scienter a requisite, yet the statutory exclusion there involved applied only to present members.

The respondent misreads Wieman in representing that it applies only to past membership. The test oath struck down in that case related to both present membership and membership within the preceding five years. The decision, however, was squarely based on the oath's failure to allow for the absence of scienter, without distinction between present and past members. Wieman itself stated (at 188) that it was decided "in the context of" three decisions (Adler; Garner v. Board of Public Works, 341 U. S. 716; and Gerende v. Board of Supervisors, 341 U. S. 56), which it considered to have established scienter as a constitutional requisite. Yet two of these cases (Adler and Gerende), involved only present membership.

Respondent's theory that organizational membership per se makes individuals loyalty and security risks is particularly terrifying in view of the fact that it justifies sanctions imposed not only on members of petitioner and other organizations proscribed under the Act, but also on the huge segment of the American population which artificially and unwittingly acquires "membership" in petitioner by the operation of section 5 of the Communist Control Act.

The respondent's suggestion that petitioner lacks standing to challenge this denial of due process to its members is based on a misrepresentation of our position. Respondent states that "petitioner raises this issue on behalf of its members, none of whom are [sic] before the Court" (Br. 202, ftn. 60). We raised the invalidity of the member sanctions on behalf of petitioner, pointing out that since "the disabilities imposed by the members directly affect and injure petitioner," petitioner may challenge them (Br. 72). The respondent's brief confirms our analysis, for it argues (204-05) that the member sanctions are valid because the members can escape them by resigning from petitioner. Thus, according to the respondent, what makes the member sanctions constitutional vis-a-vis the members is that they operate to destroy petitioner by eliminating its membership. Surely petitioner can challenge on its own behalf measure whose purposes and effect is to destroy it.

IV. The Act as a Bill of Attainder

We have dealt (Pet. Br. 63) with the respondent's contention, based on an unsound dictum in Douds, that the sanctions on the members are not punishment because the members can escape them by resigning from the organization. This argument confuses retroactivity with punishment, and the prohibition against bills of attainder with that against ex post facto legislation. The point is that recantation coerced by the threat of punishment is itself punishment.

The respondent recognizes that the organization has no escape from the punishment inflicted on it by a registration order, but asserts that the punishment indispensable to a bill of attainder "must be visited on individuals" (Br. 207). We do not believe that the prohibition against bills of attainder is so narrow. Moreover, the argument overlooks the real significance of the registration requirement, the sanctions on the organization, and the compulsion exerted on members to leave the organization in order to escape the Act's sanctions. The effect of these provisions is to compel the members to quit the organization. They thereby deprive the members of their privileges of association and concerted expression. This deprivation is inescapable; it is based on past conduct; and it has no reasonable relation to the personal fitness of the members to enjoy the privileges which the Act denies them. By any standard, therefore, the Act punishes the members.

V. Section 5 of the Communist Control Act

Respondent (Br. 157-58) makes a twofold reply to our contention (Pet. Br. 76-79) that the criteria of section 5 of the Communist Control Act for determining membership in the Communist Party are vague and irrational. First it says that the thirteen criteria which the section lists are not exclusive. But the vice of authorizing a jury to consider the thirteen irrelevant factors is obviously not cured by permitting it to consider other factors which may be relevant. Second, respondent says that the criteria are to be applied by the jury "under instructions from the court," and that it must be presumed that the guidance of the court will be intelligent. But respondent does not explain how it is possible to give "intelligent guidance" for the use of irrational standards of proof.

Respondent argues that since the introductory paragraph of section 5 refers to the determination of membership of "the accused person," the section has no bearing on the liability of the officers to list persons other than themselves in the registration statement (Resp. Br. 158-59). Such a literal reading would add a further irrational feature to the registration requirements of the Act. Respondent does not dispute that individuals must apply the criteria of section 5 in determining whether to register themselves if the organization has failed to list their names (Br. 159). Under the respondent's interpretation, a person is not a member for the purpose of registration by the organization, but is a member for the purpose of self-registration. Clearly, this double standard could not have been intended.

If section 5 is held to enumerate valid criteria of membership whenever membership of an accused person is in issue, the courts will undoubtedly apply the same criteria in all other proceedings where membership is in issue, including prosecutions of petitioner and its officers for failure to list the names of all "members". That Congress intended this result appears from paragraph (14) of section 5 which describes the previous thirteen paragraphs, without limitation, as "subjects of evidence on membership or participation in the Communist Party."

Respondent urges finally (Br. 156) that our attack upon section 5 is premature. This contention is patently fallacious if, as we contend, petitioner and its officers must, at their peril, apply the standards of section 5 in preparing a registration statement.

Moreover, the question is not premature even if section 5 is not applicable to the obligation of petitioner and its officers to list the names of petitioner's members. As we showed, section 5 makes it dangerous for any person to associate with petitioner, have business dealings with it, or express views on any subject similar to those held by it. If he does so he may thereby incur the criminal penalties which the Act imposes on members of petitioner for violating the employment and passport sanctions and for failure to register themselves (Pet. Br. 75-82). He is also exposing himself to prosecution for various other offenses, such as violation of the membership clause of the Smith Act, perjury and false statements for denials of membership in petitioner, etc. Section 5, therefore, works a present and direct injury on petitioner by frightening away its audience and suppliers of business and professional services. It quarantines petitioner and its views completely. Petitioner therefore has standing to challenge the validity of the section in this proceeding (see Pet. Br. 72).

VI. The Misapplication of the Act

A. The Erroneous Construction and Application of Section 13(e)

We have earlier noted the discrepancy between the Board's reliance on the criteria of section 1[illegible]) as the exclusive grounds for its ultimate conclusion, and respondent's present theory that these criteria are neither exclusive nor significant (supra, p. 16).

The Board's application of 13(e) was also inconsistent with its other current theory that the section's criteria can be rationally applied because the Board must consider not merely the "bare" fact to which a criterion refers, but also the more material facts to which the criterion does not refer, including, the "total picture," the "context," the "entire factual background," the "surrounding circumstances," and "the degree." (Resp. Br. 141-44; supra, p. 21.) In applying the criteria, the Board paid no attention to the total picture, the context, the factual background, the surrounding circumstances, or questions of degree. So much is clearly visible from the Board's Report, which confines itself to a discussion and finding as to the bare fact referred to in each criterion.

Accordingly, under the Board's current interpretation of the Act, the order must be set aside because it is based on a complete misapprehension of the function of section 13(e).

The Board's ultimate finding rested on its eight findings adverse to petitioner under section 13(e). It is now beyond dispute that the Board's reliance on four of these findings was misplaced. At least two of the findings were invalidated by the court below, and, as respondent points out two more concededly rest on remote evidence (Br. 217, ftn. 5; Pet. Br. 145-9, 154). Hence the respondent's brief defends only four findings (Br. 217-37).

It now appears, therefore, that the Board should have credited petitioner with favorable findings under four of the eight criteria. The Report nowhere assigns relative weights to the Board's findings under each criterion, and for all that appears, the Board relied at least as heavily on the four abandoned findings as on the four it still defends. Accordingly, a reversal is clearly required. (See authorities cited Pet. Br. 176-7.)

As to the four findings which respondent still defends, it fails to meet the criticisms made in our principal brief.

"Directives and Policies"

We stated in our principal brief that there was no evidence cited by the Board or in the record of receipt of foreign directives in any possible legitimate sense of the word, at least since petitioner's 1940 disaffiliation from the Communist International. As we also stated, there was no evidence that petitioner had any relations with the Communist International after its disaffiliation, that the Communist International survived its dissolution in 1943, that any organization ever succeeded the Communist International, or that petitioner has had any international affiliation since 1940. All the evidence is to the contrary (Pet. Br. 121). The respondent cites no evidence which contradicts the statements we made.

The absence of evidence of directives forced the Board to invent the palpably absurd theory, developed at great length in the Report, that the Marxist classics are Soviet directives (Pet. Br. 122-30). The respondent states that the Board did not base its "directives and policies" findings "exclusively upon the classics of Marxism-Leninism," and that "those works form but one part of the mass of evidence on which those findings were predicated" (Br. 223-24). The respondent does not, however, identify or analyze the "mass of evidence." This chore was done in our principal brief. There we pointed out that the Board relied on the following matters, in addition to its theory that the Marxist classics are Soviet directives: (1) claimed receipt and following of Soviet directives prior to the 1940 disaffiliation of petitioner from the Communist International; (2) petitioner's adherence to the Marxist principle of democratic centralism; (3) petitioner's views on imperialism and its programs with respect to labor, the Negro people, and youth, which, since they are based on Marxist principles, "proved" to the Board that petitioner obeys the "Soviet directives" in the Marxist classics; (4) a few scattered irrelevancies which constituted the Board's post-Act "evidence" under this standard, such as the fact that the Daily Worker had a correspondent in Moscow (Pet. Br. 121-37, 164).

The respondent's brief does not dispute the accuracy of our summation of the Board's "evidence," nor does it explain how these absurdly irrelevant matters are probative. The respondent simply fails to refute, or even to come to grips with, our showing that for want of relevant evidence under the "directives and policies" criterion, the Board distorted the criterion and found compliance with "directives" on the basis of wildly irrelevant matter.

The respondent's brief does defend the theory that Marxism-Leninism is a set of Soviet directives, by asserting that the Board was referring to Marxism-Leninism "as understood, used and followed by" petitioner (Br. 219). But again the assertion is unfounded. The Board's finding that the Marxist classics are the source of Soviet directives was based on passages taken from the books themselves as construed by the Board (R. 21-38), not on evidence of petitioner's understanding of the books. This appears not only from the Report but from respondent's own review in its brief (221-23) of the Report's treatment of the subject.[15]

[15] The Report also referred to certain oral testimony to support its views as to the meaning of Marxism-Leninism. This consisted of conclusory testimony of Lautner and Budenz giving their personal interpretation of Marxist Theory (R. 39-40), and the testimony of

Moreover, one of the grounds on which the Board refused to accept petitioner's testimony as to its understanding of Marxist principles is that the testimony was not in accord with the Marxist texts as understood by the Board (R. 38-39).

But even if it were true that petitioner understood that Marxist theory was a set of Soviet "directives", to which it subjected itself by adhering to the theory, this would not prove the "directives and policies" standard as correctly construed. For that standard must refer to enforceable orders, not to voluntary adoption of an ideological position. Otherwise, the standard would have no possible tendency to prove the 3(3) definition, and the First Amendment defects of the Act would be multiplied. (See infra, pp. 44-45.)

"Non-Deviation"

The respondent's justification of the "non-deviation" standard on its face demonstrates that the Board misapplied the standard. The respondent argues that "non-deviation" is a valid criterion because, "The fact that a local organization mirrors in each facet of its activities through the years the policies of a foreign state is surely pertinent to proof of its control by that state" (Br. 139-40). If this is what 13(e)(2) means, the Board misapplied it in at least three respects.

In the first place, the Board could not legitimately find that "each facet" of petitioner's activities corresponded to Soviet policies. On the contrary, the evidence was uncontradicted that petitioner took positions on many matters on which the Soviet Union did not express a view (R. 1225-27). Moreover, the Report itself reveals that the evidence on which the Board relied to support its finding on "non-deviation" did not relate to "each facet" of petitioner's others that petitioner's official position was that it believed in and should be guided by Marxist-Leninist principles (R. 41). The respondent's failure to discuss this irrelevant testimony in its brief is obviously discreet.

activities, but was confined to selected questions of international relations (R. 80; Pet. Br. 137).[16]

Secondly, the Board did not consider whether or not petitioner's views on these selected issues mirrored Soviet views. Mirroring requires an existing Soviet view which petitioner could reflect. The Board disregarded this requirement, by holding that the "non-deviation" test was satisfied by a showing that petitioner and the Soviet Union held similar views. It rejected and refused to consider two kinds of evidence which would have rebutted whatever inference of mirroring might arise from evidence of similarity.

The first subject relevant to mirroring which the Board refused to consider was whether the Soviet view preceded or followed petitioner's view, and hence whether or not there was an exising view which petitioner could mirror (Pet. Br. 138-40). The respondent seeks to escape this circumstance by citing seven (of the 45) "parallelisms" in which, since Soviet action was involved, the Soviet view presumably came first (Br. 229-30). But this is no justification for the Board's reliance on the 38 parallelisms in which the priority of views was not established.

The Board also refused to consider whether the similarity of the specified views of petitioner and the Soviet Union was the result, not of mirroring, but of the independent application by each of the premises and analytical approach supplied by Marxist principles. And it precluded petitioner from proving that such indeed was the case (Pet. Br. 143).[17]

[16] The respondent's brief misrepresents the facts when it states (225), "Petitioner does not deny the fact of the identity of its program and policy with that of the Soviet Union." See R. 1225-27. The respondent's brief itself eventually reduces its charge to a mirroring of views "on every significant aspect of world politics" (Br. 226).

[17] It is significant, in this respect, that the Attorney General's own expert witness on "parallelism" admitted that his testimony could not establish that the similarity of views was not the product of independent thought (Pet. Br. 143-4).

This refusal of the Board to apply a "mirroring" test is ignored by respondent's brief and is impossible to justify.

Finally, the Board's application of the "non-deviation" standard is fatally at variance with its current interpretation of the standard because the Board refused to consider whether or not the policies it examined were in fact "the policies of a foreign state" (i.e., of the Soviet Union). To impart any rationality to the non-deviation test, it must be confined to policies which are peculiar to the Soviet Union or, at most, shared with it by Communists of other countries. If a policy is generally accepted or widely held by non-Communists; if the view is merely a factual position which may well be accurate (such as that the Chiang Kai-shek regime when on the mainland was corrupt); if the view tends to promote the interest of the United States, and is the official policy of the United States government, then it is not a "Soviet view". The fact that a domestic organization subscribes to such views does not support a conclusion that it is dominated and controlled by the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, the Board refused to receive or consider evidence that the views in question were generally accepted, widely held by non-Communists (including, in some cases, the government of the United States), demonstrably true, and in the interests of the United States (Pet. Br. 140-42). It approved the position taken by the Attorney General at the administrative hearing, that "it does not matter * * * whether the Soviet view was held by many people, by some people, or by all the people" (Pet. Br. 141).

The Board now belatedly recognizes the invalidity of the position on which it made its "non-deviation" finding, for it concedes that a common belief in arithmetic or a common opposition to racial discrimination is not evidence of the existence of foreign domination or control (Br. 227). It declares, however, that the case is different when there are "sudden reversals" of position on political questions, citing three claimed instances (Br. 227, 229-30). It asserts, "The evidence at bar was of the latter type" (Br. 227-8).

The assertion is false. Aside from the three instances cited by the Board's brief, there was not even a claim that the views involved "sudden reversals".[18] Moreover, no justification is or can be offered for the Board's refusal to allow the petitioner to prove that the claimed reversals of position were attributable to circumstances other than foreign control.[19] And even if there were unexplainable "sudden reversals", the Board was unjustified in relying on the numerous parallelisms which were not reversals.

The Board not only misinterpreted the "non-deviation" standard in applying it, but also attached erroneous significance to its finding on the subject. The court below held that the "non-deviation" criterion was relevant only to the foreign control component of the section 3(3) definition, and not to the objectives component (R. 2121-22). It did so because it recognized that the criterion embraces views which are in the best interests of the United States (ibid., Pet. Br. 142). We accused the Board of having plainly erred, because, contrary to the holding of the court, it utilized its finding on non-deviation to support its ultimate finding on both components of the definition (Pet. Br. 142, 175). The respondent asserts that there is no basis for contending that the Board and the court below "were in disagreement as to the evidential effect of the 'non-deviation' finding" (Br. 226-27, ftn. 68). We believe that we were correct. The Board's Report contains no indication that its "non-deviation" finding was not used to support both components of the ultimate conclusion. That it was so used is demonstrated by the Board's brief below, which stated (87, emphasis added): [18] For a sampling of the views relied on by the Board, see Pet. Br. 141, ftn. 80. The respondent's brief itself recognizes (230) that not all the parallelisms were claimed sudden reversals.

[19] "Many thoughtful people and patriotic American citizens in 1938 and 1939 were not enthusiastic about our getting into war. Violent changes in the thinking of our people occurred in a short period of time before and after Germany broke with Russia." United States v. Lattimore, 112 F. Supp. 507, 519.

> "A reading of the Annotated Report in the Appendix of this brief (pp. 147-158) clearly shows that it is reasonable to infer domination and control and operation to advance the world Communist movement from the application made of this ["non-deviation"] criterion. Indeed, under the evidence the Board could not infer otherwise."

And even in its brief before this Court the Board at one point maintains the position that "non-deviation" "is evidence, to be weighed with all the other evidence, that the foreign power controls the domestic organization and that the domestic organization operates primarily to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement" (Br. 226, emphasis supplied).

"Discipline"

In our principal brief we described all the evidence on which the Board relied under the "discipline" criterion. The inescapable conclusion from our summary was that the Board misapplied 13(e)(6) by utilizing petitioner's self-adopted internal disciplinary practices to "prove" that petitioner's officers and members were under foreign discipline (Pet. Br. 150-52).

The respondent's brief does not dispute the accuracy of our summary of the evidence on which the Board relied, nor does it explain how instances of internal discipline can have anything to do with the foreign "discipline" test of section 13(e). Its defense is that there is "other evidence" apart from the "discipline" standard which "inexorably points to the fact that petitioner is Soviet-controlled" (Br. 232). It does not cite the evidence to which it alludes, and there is none. In any event, respondent's argument is not responsive to the question whether the Board's finding of foreign discipline was based on a misapplication of the "discipline" standard.

The Board's application of the "discipline" standard is one more example of its failure to conform to the interpretation of section 13(c) now advanced by it to support the section's validity. We argued that the "discipline" standard is irrational on its face, because it permits an organization to be condemned on the basis of the attitude of some of its leaders or members, notwithstanding that those may be an unrepresentative or dissenting minority and that the organization itself is completely independent (Pet. Br. 50). Respondent replies (Br. 144):

> "But the possibility of this result does not negate the propriety of the inquiry, which is into 'the extent to which' the organization's leaders and members are under foreign discipline * * * it is the degree * * * which the Board is directed to consider. If the evidence is equivocal or insignificant * * * the record will so show. It cannot be assumed in advance that the Board will be governed by trivial evidence or evidence having no real probative force with respect to the ultimate issue, or that Congress so intended." (Emphasis in original.)

The Board, however, in applying the "discipline" standard, made no finding as to, and did not consider, the "extent" or "degree" of the foreign discipline. And it clearly was "governed" by trivial evidence which had no probative force with respect to the criterion or to the ultimate issue.

"Allegiance"

Our principal brief examined the four bases on which the Board rested its "allegiance" findings and argued that all four represented a misapplication of the standard (Pet. Br. 154-8). The respondent's brief defends only one of the Board's four premises, namely, the conclusion that petitioner advocates the violent overthrow of the government (Br. 233-7).[20]

Insofar as the Board's conclusion rested on Marxist literature, it was, of course, inconsistent with Schneider- man v. United States, 320 U. S. 118. The respondent feebly distinguishes Schneiderman on the ground that the Board had before it Marxist literature published after 1927, as well as before (Br. 236-37). But the Board did not distinguish between the earlier and the later literature. In fact, the Report relies primarily on the early literature, as it must since the current writings in evidence, which it studiously ignores, refute its finding (see, e.g., Pet. Exs. 55, 58).

[20] This represents a "sudden reversal" by the Department of Justice, which did not allege such advocacy in the petition and contended at the administrative hearing that evidence of such advocacy was relevant only to the findings of section 2 (Pet. Br. 154, ftn. 91).

Moreover, one of the two "later" works to which the Board points in support of its contention (Br. 237) is not a "later" work at all. Stalin's Foundations of Leninism was considered in Schneiderman (at 150-51) under its earlier title, The Theory and Practice of Leninism. Indeed, Schneiderman (at 151, ftn. 38) quotes from Foundations the identical excerpt quoted and relied upon by the Report in support of its finding on "allegiance" (R. 119).

The respondent also defends the finding on advocacy of violent overthrow on the ground that it was based not only on Marxist literature, but also on the testimony of ten witnesses who had formerly been members of petitioner, and whose membership "spanned the entire existence of the Party until January 1951" (Br. 234-5).

The first thing to observe is that of these ten witnesses (named in the Report at R. 121), the membership of only one extended into the post-Act period. This was the ineffable Harvey Matusow, to whom even the Board is now unable to give any credence (Pet. Br. 213). The other nine witnesses had been separated from petitioner as far back as 1929 (Gitlow, the "former General Secretary of the Party"—Br. 235); 1934 (Kornfedder); 1936 (Nowell); 1939 (Honig); 1940 (Johnson); 1942 (Crouch); 1945 (Meyer and Budenz, the latter "a former managing editor of the Daily Worker"—Br. 235); and 1949 (Hidalgo) (R. 134-35). Thus the Board's finding rests on remote evidence, and was contrived by ignoring the more contemporaneous contrary testimony of the Attorney General's own witness.

Lautner, who was separated from the Party in 1950 (R. 135), a date later than any of the nine witnesses last mentioned (Pet. Br. 207).[21]

Moreover, of the ten witnesses relied on by the Board, three (Johnson, Crouch and Matusow) were the subject of petitioner's motion to adduce additional evidence to show that their testimony could not be credited on any subject (Pet. Br. 212-16). Yet the respondent defends the denial of the motion on the ground that the testimony of Johnson, Crouch and Matusow was of no consequence to the Board's order (Br. 279-84).

Again, despite the Board's assertions to the contrary (Br. 235-36, ftn. 74), the record, we insist, bears out our contention that Meyer's testimony could not support the force-and-violence finding, that Honig and Johnson on cross-examination contradicted their original testimony on the subject, and that Budenz' contribution was proved to be a typical invention. (See Pet. Br. 205-7, and record references there given.)

The above explains why the court below did not express concurrence with the Board's finding on violent overthrow, but affirmed the "allegiance" finding (we insist incorrectly) without reference to petitioner's claimed advocacy of force and violence (Pet. Br. 155-56).

B. The Erroneous Use of Pre-Act Evidence

The respondent agrees with us that the Act required the Board to base its findings and order upon relevant policies and practices of petitioner subsequent to the date of the Act. It further agrees that petitioner's conduct prior to [21] The Board's claim that we misstated Lautner's testimony (Br. 236, ftn. 74) is without foundation, as can be readily seen by examining the portions of the record cited at Pet. Br. 207 and those claimed to be of a contrary tenor cited in the Board's Brief at 236, ftn. 74.

that date can be relevant only to the extent that it may help to interpret or explain the significance and purpose of post-Act conduct. (See Pet. Br. 160-61; Resp. Br. 238-39).

In our principal brief (162-66) we summarized every item of post-Act evidence referred to in the Report and relied upon by the Board. The respondent does not challenge the accuracy of our summary, except to say (Br. 241-42) that one item was stated "more pointedly" by the Board than by us. An inspection of these items of post-Act evidence, disinterred from the overwhelming mass of discussion of pre-Act evidence, belies the respondent's undocumented assertion (Br. 238) that the findings and order of the Board "are based on petitioner's current practices and activities * * *." Nor does respondent challenge our statement (Pet. Br. 166) that none of the six factors which the court below relied upon as determinative of the case against petitioner involved relevant post-Act conduct.

Respondent denies (Resp. Br. 240-42) that the post-Act evidence set forth in our summary is, as we contend, irrelevant and immaterial both to the criteria of section 13(e) and to the section 3(3) definition of a Communist-action organization. However, it points to only two items of the post-Act evidence, neither of which lends any support to its position.

The first item relied on by respondent is that subsequent to the date of the Act petitioner adopted views similar to those of the Soviet Union on certain international questions (Resp. Br. 241). The Report reveals (R. 83-84) that these views were that the People's Republic of China should be seated in the United Nations, that the United States and the United Nations should not have intervened in the Korean war, that the Synghman Rhee regime was reactionary, that a Korean cease-fire should be negotiated, and that prohibition of the use of atomic weapons, as proposed in the Stockholm peace petition, was in the interest of world peace. As the court below held, however, and as respondent sometimes seems to concede, this application of the "non-deviation" criterion has no relevance whatsoever to the "objectives" component of the section 3(3) definition (see supra, pp. 35-36). Nor does petitioner's advocacy of these views, which were likewise advocated by many non-Communists, have any tendency to prove the "domination and control" element of the definition as now construed by respondent itself (see supra, p. 34).

The only other item of post-Act evidence on which respondent relies (Br. 241-42) is the fact that many years ago a number of petitioner's present leaders visited and studied in the Soviet Union. As respondent's quotation from the Report reveals (ibid.), the only conclusion the Board drew from that fact was that these leaders:

> "* * * have accepted the views and policies of the Soviet Union and have carried such policies into [petitioner], making them the views and policies of [petitioner]."

This finding has no evidentiary support. But even if it had, it is nothing but another application of the "non-deviation" criterion. And certainly the finding that petitioner and some of its leaders voluntarily "accepted" Soviet policies cannot establish that the Soviet Union "dominates and controls" either the leaders or the organization.[22]

[22] Unable to point to any of petitioner's current activities which can support the order, respondent resorts to statistics to lend the post-Act evidence a spurious quantitative significance. It says (Br. 242) that 56 exhibits (out of 507) were published after the date of the Act, but it does not indicate the relevance of any of them, and they have none. Respondent lists 26 of these exhibits (Br. 242, ftn. 78). All of them with one exception (a certified copy of the indictment and other judicial records in the Dennis case) consist of books or articles published in newspapers and magazines. Sixteen of the 26 were offered in evidence through the witness Mosely to prove "non-deviation." Seven were placed in evidence by the Attorney General at the close of his case and were not the subject of any testimony. The remaining three consist of the published proceedings of petitioner's 1950 national convention. Respondent further says (ibid.) that 500 (out of 14,400) transcript pages were occupied by the testi-

Respondent's defense of the Report confirms our statement (Pet. Br. 166) that, at most, the post-Act evidence establishes only that petitioner (1) is an American political party which subscribes to the principles of Communism and (2) advocates certain policies on international questions which it believes to be in the interest of peace and which are similar to policies of the Soviet Union. After a fifteen-month hearing, 14,400 pages of testimony, and 507 exhibits, respondent rests its case on matters that petitioner has long and publicly proclaimed, and which it re-asserted in its answer to the petition (R. 165-66).

The respondent avoids a defense of the Board's reliance on a presumption of "continuance" (Pet. Br. 168) by denying that the Board employed one (Resp. Br. 240). The Report, however, contradicts this denial (R. 130).[23] Furthermore, respondent does not take issue with our statement (Pet. Br. 169) that the court below based its affirmance on a similar presumption. Nor does it challenge our demonstration that the court's reliance on such presumption, like the action of the Board, was plainly erroneous and requires a reversal (Pet. Br. 168-69).

mony of witnesses whose membership in petitioner extended beyond the date of the Act. This is a statistical overstatement, since most of the testimony of these witnesses related to pre-Act matters. Respondent does not indicate how many of the 500 pages contain testimony relating to petitioner's activities after the date of the Act. Although it states that these witnesses "testified extensively concerning the post-Act period," it nowhere describes this testimony or indicates its relevance, and it has none.

[23] The Report states (ibid.): "The law assumes in the absence of proof to the contrary, which [petitioner] did not establish to our satisfaction, that a condition or set of facts shown not too remotely in the past (all circumstances considered) to have existed, still continues. In the circumstances here presented we do not consider that the passage of the Act, in and of itself, affects this presumption respecting it."

C. The Insufficiency of the Evidence

The respondent cites the size of the record to support its argument that the Court should not review the sufficiency of the evidence (Br. 209-11). The size of the record, however, is of no consequence, since a reading of it is unnecessary to a determination that the Board's findings are not supported by a preponderance of the evidence as required by the Act. Moreover, it is amply clear that the court below did not make a fair assessment of the record on the issue of sufficiency. Both of these facts can be determined from a reading of the Board's Report, loaded though it is, and the opinion below.

The following facts emerge from such a reading:

1. Of the eight key findings made by the Board under section 13(e), the respondent can now only defend four. It has been forced to abandon the two findings (on "reporting" and "secret practices") which were invalidated by the court below, and two others (on "financial aid" and "instruction and training") which admittedly rested on utterly remote evidence. (See supra, pp. 29-30.) The fact that the court below sustained the Board's reliance on these two now abandoned findings, itself shows that the court did not make a fair assessment of the record.

2. It is plain from the Report and the opinion below that the Board's order is not supported by relevant evidence of post-Act conduct. (See supra, pp. 39-42; Pet. Br. 160-70).

3. As to the four key findings still defended by respondent ("directives and policies," "non-deviation," "discipline," and "allegiance"), it is plain from the Report that the absence of probative evidence to support them drove the Board to torture the terms of section 13(e) and to rely on evidence having no rational relationship to its standards or to the ultimate issue defined by section 3(3). (See supra, pp. 30-39.)

4. We showed in our principal brief that the Board's finding that there exists a world Communist movement "substantially as described in section 2 of the Act" was not supported by any evidence of the four factors which define the supposed movement. We also showed that the court's affirmance of the Board's finding on the subject was based on irrelevant matters (Pet. Br. 193-99.) The respondent's brief evades our demonstration on the subject, and defends the Board's finding merely by referring to some excerpts from early Marxist works (Br. 246-51).

5. The Report and the opinion below show that there is no evidentiary support for the ultimate finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization.

As we showed in our principal brief (158-60), the six factors relied on by the court below to sustain the ultimate finding have no rational tendency to prove it. The respondent's brief does not contest our demonstration.

The only finding of the Board which is claimed to have any relevancy to the objectives component of the 3(3) definition is its finding on "directives and policies" (supra, p. 18). This finding, however, as we have seen, is a concoction based on the absurd thesis that Marxist literature constitutes "Soviet directives" (supra, pp. 30-32).

Nor is there any evidence which can prove the foreign control component of the 3(3) definition. If, as the Board contends, the Soviet Union gives "directives" to petitioner, then petitioner, if it carries them out, does so only because it wishes to. If, as the Board further contends, petitioner's views do not "deviate" from those of the Soviet Union, if some of its leaders and members recognize Soviet "discipline" or avow a superior "allegiance" to the Soviet Union, such "non-deviation," "discipline," and "allegiance" are voluntary and ideological only. There is no way by which the Soviet Union can enforce obedience to its directives, or acceptance of its views, and discipline, or loyalty to it. If financial aid were being given, the threat of its withdrawal could possibly be a device of control. But the Board itself has found that there has been no such aid in many years.

This sort of adherence, even if it were proved, would not and could not constitute foreign direction, domination and control under section 3(3). The control envisaged by that section must be an effective, enforceable control, not a mere voluntary acceptance of policies, even if they have a foreign origin. Otherwise the definition would be hopelessly vague, and the Act would further violate the First Amendment by penalizing nothing more than an ideological agreement with "foreign" views.

We believe that our point has been well stated in the amicus brief of the National Lawyers Guild (p. 41):

> "The fact is that any reason for interfering with First Amendment rights of organizations under 'foreign control' is completely absent in the case of voluntary associations operating within the United States. Such associations are masters of their own decisions. Neither they nor their members are subject to any physical or police control from abroad. The organization operates under American laws, in an American environment, subject to everyday American customs, ideas and traditions, and it must secure the approval of American public opinion. Apart from financial contributions—a special issue, but not one involved here—the kind of 'control' exercised by a foreign government or organization is ideological in character. The American association or individual can always withdraw. What is designated by the Act as 'control', therefore, is in reality little more than ideological influence."

The respondent's brief abandons the Report, the opinion below, and the record. It rests on nothing but its ipse dixit and appeals to prejudice, hoping that references to claimed events in Czechoslovakia, Canada, Korea, and Australia, and to reports of Congressional committees, will be an acceptable substitute for proof.

D. The Unfair Hearing and the Affidavits of Bias and Prejudice

1. The respondent dismisses as innocuous and speculative the evidence supporting our claim that pressure was exerted on the Board members by the Senate Judiciary Committee at the very time when the Committee had before it for confirmation the nominations of the Board members (Pet. Br. 178-83). The Board's approach, however, ignores the realities of life. The chairman of the hearing panel, Board Member LaFollette, recognized the pressure to which respondent is oblivious (Pet. Br. 181). Moreover, the respondent overlooks the fact that the panel prevented the petitioner from fully developing the facts concerning the surveillance of the Board (Pet. Br. 180-81).

2. As to the affidavit of bias and prejudice filed against Board Member McHale, the respondent (Br. 272) suggests innocuous interpretations of her remarks. Dr. McHale's speech was brief, it appears in the printed record at R. 193-6, and we ask that the Court examine it and draw its own conclusions.

The respondent (Br. 275) likewise glosses over Board Chairman Brown's remarks made on an anti-Communist television-radio program while the case was still pending before the Board. The substance of these remarks appears in the printed record at R. 197-8 and 206-8, and we ask that the Court examine them. The Board also relies on the fact that Mr. Brown had already participated in issuing a recommended decision at the time the remarks were made. But Mr. Brown still had quasi-judicial functions to perform, including passing on exceptions to the recommended decision and participating in the final decision.

Even if the remarks of Dr. McHale and Mr. Brown had not exhibited bias and prejudgment, their public discussions of the pending case, before a political club in one instance and on an anti-Communist program in the other, were themselves such gross improprieties as to require disqualification of two of the four Board members who issued the Board's order.

E. The Failure to Remand the Proceeding for Administrative Redetermination

In our principal brief we urged that the court below was required to remand the proceeding for administrative redetermination because of its action in striking two key findings of the Board (on "reporting" and "secret practices") and in holding, in effect, that a third finding (on "nondeviation") was given an erroneous application (Pet. Br. 175-77).

Respondent claims that the findings as to "secret practices" and "reporting" were not stricken, but "modified" (Br. 260). The court, however, specifically stated as to "secret practices" that "we strike the finding as to purpose" (R. 2151). And as to "reporting" the court stated that "we would strike this finding as phrased" (R. 2149).

The pertinent question, however, is not the appropriateness of the label describing what the court did, but the effect of its action. The effect was to make each finding irrelevant both to the criterion under which it was made and to the section 3(3) definition.

Since the existence of one of the purposes described in section 13(e)(7) is an indispensable element of the "secret practices" criterion (Pet. Br. 51, 153-54) the decision below that there was a failure of proof of purpose necessarily invalidated the Board's finding that the evidence satisfied the criterion. Furthermore, it is obvious that the bare fact that petitioner engaged in precautionary practices has no relevance to the section 3(3) definition of a Communist-action organization.

Similarly, the holding below that the evidence failed to establish "constant, systematic reporting as of now" (R. 2149) necessarily invalidated the finding of the Board that the evidence satisfied section 13(e)(5). For the court itself (ibid.) held that the term "reports" as used in that section means such current, constant, systematic reporting.

The court's suggested substitute finding (ibid.) that "upon occasion" leaders of the party report to representatives of the Soviet Union" is contrary to the evidence (see Pet. Br. 150). But even if such a finding had evidentiary support, it would have no relevance to the section 3(3) definition. The respondent acknowledges as much when it states that the fact of "reporting" can have relevance to the definition only in connection with "such surrounding circumstances as the length of time the reporting goes on, the frequency of its occurrence, the conditions of secrecy under which it is carried out, the contents of the reports, the reasons therefor, and all the other background data" (Br. 143).

Accordingly, however, one may label the action of the court below, the effect of that action was to invalidate the Board's findings on these two criteria as bases for its order.

Respondent denies (Resp. Br. 259-60) that the Board applied the "non-deviation" criterion in a manner that the court held erroneous by using the finding under that criterion to support its ultimate conclusion as to the nature of petitioner's objectives. As we have seen, however (supra, p. 35), the denial is inaccurate.

Respondent attempts to distinguish N.L.R.B. v. Virginia Electric & Power Co., 314 U. S. 469, by stating that there it was unclear from the record on just what evidence the administrative findings were based (Br. 261, ftn. 84). The Court, however, specifically stated (at 479) that it was remanding the proceedings for administrative redetermination because, "it appears that the Board rested heavily on findings with regard to the bulletin and the speeches, the adequacy of which we regard as doubtful." Again the Court said (at 476):

> "But here the Board's conclusion that the Independent was a company-dominated union seems based heavily on findings which are not free from ambiguity and doubt. We believe that the Board, and not this Court, should undertake the task of clarification."

Respondent's reliance on N.L.R.B. v. Newport News Co., 308 U. S. 241 (Br. 261), is misplaced. For there the Court stated (at 244): "The Board's subsidiary findings of fact are not the subject of serious controversy," and it found (at 251) that the order of the Board was supported by "the uncontradicted facts."

The decision in Virginia Electric is controlling, and indeed the case for a remand is stronger here. The Board not only based its conclusion on findings adverse to petitioner under all eight criteria, but relied heavily on its findings with respect to "secret practices," "reporting," and "nondeviation" (Pet. Br. 177).[24] Thus the reviewing court cannot say that the Board would have reached the same result in the absence of the invalid findings.

The Act does not, as respondent suggests (Br. 261), authorize the reviewing court to substitute its judgment for that of the Board and to affirm an order on the ground that a preponderance of the evidence supports the Board's ultimate conclusion, even if it does not support key findings on which the conclusion rests. Section 14 of the Act does not direct the court to consider whether or not the order of the Board is supported by a preponderance of the evidence. What it requires is that the Board's findings as to the facts be so supported. Since the court below concluded that the record did not support key findings on which the Board based the order, the Act required a remand for administrative redetermination.

F. The Motion for Leave to Adduce Additional Evidence

Respondent does not challenge our statement (Pet. Br. 214) that the additional evidence petitioner offered to adduce would have completely destroyed the credibility of the Attorney General's witnesses, Matusow, Crouch and Johnson. Nor does it deny the fact (Pet. Br. 212) that the Board made extensive use of the testimony of these witnesses in making its findings of fact.

[24] Our contention is confirmed by the concession respondent again makes (Resp. Br. 217) that the Board attached little weight to its adverse findings on "financial aid" and "instruction and training."

Respondent quotes at length from its memorandum below in opposition to petitioner's motion, arguing that the Board could have disregarded the testimony of the three witnesses and reached the same result (Br. 279-83). But respondent has no answer to N.L.R.B. v. Indiana and Michigan Electric Co., 318 U. S. 9 (see Pet. Br. 214-15), where the Court rejected this argument.

Respondent's position here is inconsistent with the Solicitor General's recent confession of error upon the petition for certiorari to review the denial of a new trial in Kretske v. United States, No. 91, this term. There, as the government stated, the evidence of guilt was clear and the newly discovered evidence was only impeaching (see Memorandum for the United States, p. 7).

VII. The Invalidity of the Appointments to the Board

Respondent contends that Article 2, section 2, clause 3 of the Constitution authorizes the President to make recess appointments to offices newly created by Congress during its session and remaining unfilled after its adjournment (Br. 291-98). Its argument is based primarily on considerations of administrative convenience. The framers of the Constitution, however, were perfectly aware that problems of administrative efficiency might arise from the requirement of Article 2, section 2, clause 2 that the appointive power of the President shall be exercised with the advice and consent of the Senate. Clause 3 accommodates the principle that executive power must be limited to considerations of administrative convenience only in the special circumstances, which the clause describes in terms that are carefully chosen and precisely formulated.

Clause 3 authorizes a presidential appointment without the advice and consent of the Senate only (a) where there is a "vacancy"; (b) where the vacancy "happens"; and (c) where it happens during "the Recess". If this provision means what its authors obviously intended from their choice of words, it is clear that none of these three conditions is satisfied in the case of an office which is newly created by an act of Congress (see Pet. Br. 186-87).

Respondent makes no reply to our contention that a vacancy does not "happen" in the constitutional sense when an office is newly created by law, but only when the vacancy results from death, resignation, promotion or removal. Yet this construction of the term "happen" was the basis for the action of the Senate in 1813 and 1822 and the principal ground for the decision in Schenk v. Peay, 21 Fed. Cas. 672 (Pet. Br. 186). It is also the ground for the distinction drawn by the commentators between the presidential appointive power in the cases of pre-existing and newly created offices (Pet. Br. 187).

Moreover, there is a plain distinction, even in terms of administrative convenience, between an office newly created by Congress and a vacancy in a pre-existing office. As to the latter, it can be urged, for example, that the death of an incumbent might occur during a session of Congress but not come to the knowledge of the President until after the adjournment, in which case he would not have had an opportunity to consult the Senate while it was in session. Contrariwise, the existence of a newly created office is always known by both the Congress and the President so that, if the matter is deemed of sufficient urgency, the Senate can remain in session to receive and act upon a nomination.

The statement by Madison relied on by respondent (Br. 294) makes no reference to the case of a newly created office. He states that it is only "in cases of necessity and urgency" that the power to make recess appointments was understood to comprehend vacancies that first occur during the session. The only examples of such cases that he puts suppose that the President secured the advice and consent of the Senate, but that the appointments were frustrated by circumstances of which neither the President nor the Senate was aware—i.e., the death of the nominee before confirmation, or the refusal of the nominee to accept the appointment after Congress adjourned.

Respondent suggests (Br. 297) that there has been legislative acquiescence in the line of Attorney Generals' decisions which it cites, but it can refer to no legislative action which supports that suggestion. In fact, only five Attorney Generals' opinions deal with newly created offices, and two of these hold against the existence of the power to make recess appointments (Pet. Br. 187). Furthermore, the three opinions which support the existence of the power in the case of such newly created offices are contrary to the position taken by the Senate (Pet. Br. 186, 187, ftn. 111). Finally, those opinions which sustain the power as to pre-existing offices are not persuasive since they demonstrate that the existence of the power, even in that case, "has been practically asserted by Presidents only, and has not been recognized without constantly recurring suggestions by them of doubts as to its existence under the Constitution." Case of the District Attorney, 7 Fed. Cas. 731, 744.

CONCLUSION

The respondent discusses the Act and the order of the Board as though they affected no one but petitioner. It emphasizes that no other organization or individual is before the Court and insists that the isolated question which the case presents is the validity of the order that petitioner register as a Communist-action organization. It urges that "These facts will mold the frame in which the Court will view the case." (Resp. Br. 42).

We have shown in our principal brief and in this reply that even on this narrow view of the issues, the Act and the order are plainly invalid. Yet we do not believe that the Court will adopt so limited a perspective in its approach to the grave constitutional and procedural questions which the case presents. True, these questions are brought here by an organization whose economic and political philosophy is undoubtedly repugnant to the Court. But that fact in nowise diminshes their gravity and importance to the future of the nation.

The proscription of the Communist Party would itself serve notice to the world that America has lost faith in the democratic process. But something even more fundamental is at stake. As the President observed when the Act was passed, it represents "a clear and present danger to our institutions" because it involves "breaking down the Bill of Rights in order to get at the Communists" (Pet. Br. 5, 6). Thus, the basic issue which emerges from the record is not Communism but the Constitution—not whether Communists are outside the pale, but whether the guarantees of individual liberty on which the Republic was founded shall survive to protect the whole people.

A similar question confronted the nation in its infancy when the Alien and Sedition Laws were enacted in the belief that war with revolutionary France was inevitable. Senator Mason of Virginia succinctly stated the issue of 1798 when he expressed the hope:

> "that the people will be brought to reflect before it is too late, and not suffer themselves to be deluded by a false and groundless clamor about French influence and a French party in this country, until all the foundations of their liberty are sapped, all the barriers of the Constitution broken down, and themselves reduced to a state of vassalage." [25]

[25] Letter to Matthew Lyon. The Scourge of Democracy (Fairhaven, Vt., 1798). The Act also recalls another shameful episode in our history, the 1920 expulsion of the Socialist members of the New York Assembly over the vigorous protest of Charles Evans Hughes and many others. Chaffee describes the inception of that proceeding as follows: "The Lusk Committee's resolution did not

Today, when the danger of war has subsided and international tensions are being reduced by peaceful negotiation, a hope similar to Senator Mason's is being voiced throughout America. The realization of that hope will be immeasurably advanced if the Act and the Board's order are set aside, and the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution are thus reaffirmed as the keystone to the security of our nation and its people.

Respectfully submitted,

The majority (Op. 1–76, R. 2083–2158)[1] and dissenting (Op. 76–89, R. 2158–2171) opinions in the Court of Appeals have not yet been reported. The Report of the Subversive Activities Control

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on December 23, 1954 (R. 2172), and a petition for rehearing (R. 2173–2198) was denied on January 14, 1955 (R. 2199, 2200). The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed on April 13, 1955. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C. 1254 and Section 14 (a) of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 (see Pet. App. 121–122).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the legislative findings and criteria included in the Subversive Activities Control Act deprived petitioner of a fair hearing. (Pet. Ques. 1.)

2. Whether the consequences of registration under the Act are such as to invalidate the registration requirement under the due-process clause. (Pet. Ques. 1.)

[2] The Report as it appears at R. 1–137 is the unannotated version, published as Sen. Doc. No. 41, 83d Cong., 1st sess. At R. 1803–2051 it appears in annotated form, i. e., with record references keyed to the Joint Appendix below (herein referred to as "R."). The annotated version was filed in the court below as an appendix to respondent's brief. Whenever we have occasion to refer to the Report, we shall first give the reference to the unannotated version and then, in brackets, the reference to the annotated version, e. g., "R. 1–137 [1803–2051]."

3. Whether the fact that at such time as the order requiring petitioner to register becomes final some individual will be required to effect registration for petitioner raises questions in this proceeding as to the validity of the Act under the self-incrimination clause and, if so, whether the Act is for this reason invalid. (Pet. Ques. 1.)

4. Whether the consequences of registration with respect to future activities of petitioner are such as to invalidate the Act as an interference with free speech and peaceable assembly in violation of the First Amendment. (Pet. Ques. 1.)

5. Whether the court below erred in affirming the order of the Board as founded on a correct construction of the requirements of the Act and as supported by a preponderance of the evidence. (Pet. Ques. 2–7.)

6. Whether the court below properly rejected petitioner's attack on the Board as biased. (Pet. Ques. 8.)

7. Whether the court below properly exercised its discretion in denying petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence. (Pet. Ques. 9.)

8. Whether the recess appointments of three of the Board's members were valid, and whether in any event the Board's final order is valid, it being undisputed that the Board was properly constituted at the time of the order and from a date early in the course of the hearings herein. (Pet. Ques. 10.)

STATUTES INVOLVED

The pertinent provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 (Title I of the Internal Security Act of [September 23,] 1950, c. 1024, 64 Stat. 987, 50 U. S. C. 781 ff.), as amended, the Immigration and Nationality Act [of June 27, 1952], c. 477, 66 Stat. 163, and the Communist Control Act of [August 24,] 1954, c. 886, 68 Stat. 775, are set forth in Appendix B to the petition for certiorari (Pet. 86–131).

STATEMENT

On November 22, 1950, the Attorney General, pursuant to Section 13 (a) of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 (hereafter referred to as the Act), filed with the Subversive Activities Control Board (respondent herein, and hereafter referred to as the Board) a petition (R. 143–159) for an order directing the present petitioner, the Communist Party of the United States, to register with him as a "Communist-action organization" in the manner required by Section 7 (a), (c), and (d) of the Act. On February 14 and April 3, 1951, respectively, petitioner filed an answer (R. 160–161) and amended answer (R. 161–187) in which, inter alia, it denied being a Communist-action organization as defined by Section 3 (3) of the Act.

Hearings for the purpose of taking evidence commenced on April 23, 1951, before three members of the Board sitting as a hearing panel

(R. 1). On October 20, 1951, one member of the hearing panel (Charles M. LaFollette) became unavailable to the Board by virtue of the adjournment of Congress without taking action on his nomination. The hearing proceeded before the remaining two members of the panel, who were present and participated during the entire hearing. The hearings ended on July 1, 1952. (R. 1, 2.)

On October 20, 1952, the hearing panel issued its recommended decision finding petitioner to be a Communist-action organization and recommending that the Board order it to register as such. Thereafter exceptions to the recommended decision and various motions were filed and argued. (R. 2.) On April 20, 1953, the Board issued its Report (R. 1–137 [1803–2051]) and order (R. 138 [2052]) directing petitioner to register in accordance with the finding that it was a Communist-action organization. The Report was unanimous.[3] "Upon the overwhelming weight of the evidence in this proceeding," the Report concluded, "we find that [petitioner] is substantially

[3] The Report was signed by three members of the Board (R. 132 [2042]). The fourth member of the Board filed a short concurring opinion in which he stated that he was "fully in accord with and concur in the findings and in the determination that the Respondent herein, the Communist Party of the United States of America, is a Communist-action organization under subsection (3) of Section 3 of the Act and required to register as such under Section 7" (R. 133 [2042–2043]).

directed, dominated, and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement referred to in Section 2 of the Act; and that [petitioner] operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement" (R. 132 [2042]).[4]

On June 17, 1953, petitioner, pursuant to Section 14 (a) of the Act, filed in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit a petition for review (R. 139–142) of the Board's order. Following submission of the case on briefs and oral argument, the court, on September 13, 1954, set the case for reargument, the order directing counsel to discuss, inter alia, "the effect, if any, of the Communist Control Act of [August 24,] 1954, upon the order here under review" (R. 2081). On December 23, 1954, following the submission of further briefs and oral argument, the order of the Board was affirmed (R. 2172), one judge dissenting. The court, while modifying two of the Board's subsidiary findings of fact (Op. 72, 73–74, R. 2154, 2155–2156; see infra, pp. 30–33), held nevertheless, after a painstaking review of the evidence (Op. 48–75, R. 2130–2157), that the "ultimate finding of the Board"—i. e., that petitioner "is substantially directed, dominated and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement referred to in Section 2 of the Act" and "operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement"—"is supported by the basic findings which are in our opinion supported by a preponderance of the evidence, and that the ultimate finding is itself supported by a preponderance of the evidence" (Op. 75–76, R. 2157–2158).

[4] Under Section 3 (3) of the Act, this finding brought petitioner within the definition of a "Communist-action organization." The evidence on which the Board's finding was based is set forth in detail in the Report at R. 4–128 [1809–2034]), the bracketed reference containing the supporting references to the testimony and exhibits. The Board's Report summarizes the evidence on both sides. Where issues of credibility are encountered on important points, the Board has recorded its position. Similarly, where there are conflicts in testimony on particular issues, the Board has resolved them. There is therefore, we feel, no need to attempt to summarize the voluminous evidence supporting the Board's particular findings and ultimate finding.

Other pertinent facts will be stated at appropriate points in the Argument.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

A. Constitutionality of the Act

1. The legislative findings and statutory criteria under the due process clause

The contention that Congress incorporated into the Act a "built-in finding" against petitioner "by legislative fiat" by reason of the findings embodied in Section 2 as to the existence of a "world Communist movement" and a "Communist movement in the United States" confuses two sets of facts—the legislative facts and the adjudicative facts. To come within the purview of the Act, an organization must be found by the Board, on evidence whose sufficiency is subject to judicial review, to be substantially controlled by the foreign country or organization controlling the world Communist movement and to operate primarily to advance the objectives of that movement.

The Act is basically a regulatory measure. The so-called "sanctions" which become applicable upon an organization's registration or a final order to register have prospective effect only, thus lacking a fundamental characteristic of bills of attainder—the imposition of punishment for past conduct. Criminal penalties for noncompliance with the Act's terms can be imposed only after trial by jury.

The Act does not authorize a determination that an organization is a Communist-action organization on the basis of irrational or vague criteria. The listed criteria indicate types of evidence relevant to the ultimate factual issue of whether an organization fulfills the Act's definition of a Communist-action organization. Section 13 (e) contains no formula, nor are the listed criteria in any sense exclusive.

2. The consequences of registration on officers and members of petitioner.

The Act does not deprive petitioner's members of liberty and property merely by reason of their association, without proof of scienter. The "sanctions" are applicable only where it is shown that the member concerned has knowledge or notice that the organization has registered or been finally ordered to register as a Communist-action organization.

3. The requirement of registration and self-incrimination

The contention that the Act "violates the privilege against self-incrimination" is at least premature in this proceeding. The privilege is a personal one, not available to an organization as such. In the case of a demand for the production of an organization's records, an officer of the organization may not refuse to produce them even if they would tend to incriminate him personally. United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694. Moreover, even if the White rule were considered inapplicable here, the privilege would protect only the person called upon to submit the registration statement. And even as to him, he would have to claim his privilege. It cannot be assumed at this time that officials of petitioner will inevitably claim the privilege when called on to effect petitioner's registration, especially since the top officials of petitioner, who would be the ones required to file the registration statement, have never attempted to conceal their membership or their places of leadership.

4. The consequences of registration and the First Amendment

The Act is not violative of First Amendment freedoms. If Congress, in order to protect interstate commerce, can validly deny the privileges of union office to members of the Communist Party because of the program of that Party (American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382), it can, in order to protect the Government itself, impose restrictions upon adherents of a world Communist movement such as that described in the Act. The disclosure requirements of the Act are reasonable in the light of the legislative findings set forth in Section 2. The "sanctions" imposed on covered organizations and their members are reasonably related to the evil at which Congress was aiming.

B. The proceeding before the Board

1. The Court of Appeals' modification of two of the eight subsidiary findings of the Board did not necessitate remand of the case to the Board. Affirmance of the Board's order was proper in view of the court's finding that the Board's ultimate finding of fact was fully supported by a preponderance of the evidence.

2. The Board did not place too much reliance on pre-Act evidence in reaching its conclusion that petitioner is a Communist-action organization. An organization's past is clearly pertinent to its present nature.

3. The Board and the Court of Appeals did not misconstrue or misapply any of the evidentiary criteria of Section 13 (e). The contention that the Board found "a century-old, constantly evolving system of political thought [Marxism-Leninism]" to constitute "a series of Soviet 'directives'" to petitioner is based on a distortion of the Board's report. The "non-deviation" criterion refers to "identity or coincidence and not to chronological adoption."

4. The contention that the Board and Court of Appeals "erroneously construed and applied the Act's definition of the world Communist movement" is based on the incorrect assumption that the existence of "a world Communist movement" as found by Congress in Section 2 of the Act was subject to redetermination in the administrative proceeding.

5. In view of the substantial concurrence of the Court of Appeals in the Board's findings, there is no occasion for further review by this Court of the sufficiency of the evidence.

C. The attack on the Board as biased

1. The argument that the Board was "necessarily biased" against petitioner because it would have rendered itself functus officio if it found petitioner not to be a Communist-action organization is unsound. It is tantamount to a charge that the Board members were bound to violate their oaths of office.

2. The hearing was not unfair. The speech of Dr. McHale of which petitioner complains did not manifest prejudgment of the issues. The appearance of Board Chairman Brown on a television program in which he discussed the case occurred after he and Dr. McHale, constituting the hearing panel, had handed down their recommended decision.

D. Petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence

The Court of Appeals appropriately exercised its discretion in denying petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board. The court could properly conclude from the motion papers and the Board's opposing memorandum that even if the testimony of the three witnesses who allegedly gave false testimony were completely disregarded the final result could not be different.

E. The validity of the appointments of members of the Board

The recess appointments of the three Board members in question were valid when made and remained valid at all times thereafter until final Senate confirmation. Petitioner's challenge of the appointments is based on technical arguments which have been considered and found untenable by the authorities. Furthermore, even if there were technical merit in any of the arguments, the validity of the Board's final order would not be affected, since it is undisputed that the appointments were valid from August 9, 1951, a date shortly after the beginning of the taking of testimony and long prior to the issuance of the order under review.

ARGUMENT

A. Constitutionality of the Act

1. The legislative findings and statutory criteria under the due process clause

a. Petitioner contends (Pet. 47–50, 14–16) that the legislative findings embodied in Section 2 of the Act as to the existence of a "world Communist movement" (subsection (1)) and a "Communist movement in the United States" presenting "a clear and present danger to the security of the United States" (subsection (15)) constitute a partial predetermination of the issue that the Board was called upon to decide, namely, whether petitioner is a "Communist-action organization" within Section 3 (3). Section 3 (3), it is pointed out, defines such an organization as one substantially controlled by the government or organization controlling the world Communist movement referred to in Section 2 and operating primarily to advance the objectives of that movement. It is urged that this partial predetermination "by legislative fiat" "violates due process" (Pet. 47) and incorporates into the Act a "built-in finding" against petitioner (Pet. 50).

Petitioner's contention seems in essence to be that due process requires that the legislative findings of Section 2 be the subject of redetermination in the administrative proceeding in a "free adjudication of the facts" (Pet. 48). We submit that the argument confuses two sets of facts—the legislative facts which reasonably tend to establish a situation which Congress, on investigation, has found to require legislative action, and the adjudicative facts which, on proof in adversary litigation, bring a specific organization or person within the purview of the legislation enacted. See McCormick, Judicial Notice, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 296, 315–318. Legislative facts are general conclusions which support the policy of a particular law, and can be attacked only by showing that Congress acted arbitrarily or unreasonably or beyond its delegated powers. Alabama State Federation of Labor v. McAdory, 325 U. S. 450, 465–466; United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U. S. 144, 152–153. The facts on which the legislature acted can frequently be the subject of judicial notice; in other cases the courts may make inquiry to determine whether there is a reasonable basis for the legislative action. Borden's Farm Products Co. v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 194, 210; Chastleton Corp. v. Sinclair, 264 U. S. 543, 548; see McCormick, Judicial Notice, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 296, 315–318. But at most the inquiry is as to whether the legislature has acted reasonably. Here, Congress recorded in Section 2 the basis for its action, the threat to the United States presented by the world and American Communist movement.

As this Court said with respect to these very findings, in Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, 529:

> On the basis of extensive investigation Congress made many findings, including that > in § 2 (1) of the [Internal Security] Act that the "Communist movement * * * is a world-wide revolutionary movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship" * * *. Certainly, we cannot say that this classification by Congress is so baseless as to be violative of due process and therefore beyond the power of Congress.

Even if Congress had specifically identified petitioner by name as the "Communist organization in the United States" to which it refers in Section 2 (15), the adjudicative or operational facts which would bring it within the definition of Section 3 (3) would not have thereby been legislatively predetermined in a sense offensive to the requirements of due process. A Communist organization which is not "substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement" or which does not "operate primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement" would be excluded by the definition. There would not, in short, be anything in the Act, even if Congress had thus named petitioner, to have prevented the Board from finding that petitioner lacked the essential features on which the Act made the requirement of registration depend.[5] That Congress may have believed that petitioner would fall within the definition of Section 3 (3) is of no moment so far as the requirements of due process are concerned. We assume that Congress supposes in the case of many of the statutes it passes that specific organizations or persons will be subject to their terms. As the court below observed, "A statute is not necessarily null merely because it fits a known person. Many valid statutes do" (Op. 40, R. 2122). The important point is that Congress required proof of the operative facts by a preponderance of the evidence, and made the Board's decisions subject to judicial review before any requirement of the Act could become effective.[6]

[5] For this reason the fact that Section 4 of the Communist Control Act of 1954 (see also Section 2 of that Act) referred to petitioner by name as a "Communist-action" organization does not, we submit, contrary to petitioner's contention (Pet. 50), add weight to its basic argument. In any event, since that Act was passed after the issuance of the order under review, it is evident that the Act's designation of petitioner by name could not have influenced the Board's deliberations or otherwise affected the administrative proceeding.

[6] The decisions cited by petitioner (Pet. 48), of which Tot v. United States, 319 U. S. 463, is representative, concern the validity of statutory presumptions under the due-process clause. They hold that, in the language of Tot (id., 467), "a statutory presumption cannot be sustained if there be no rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed, if the inference of the one from proof of the other is arbitrary because of lack of connection between the two in common experience." But the Subversive Activities Control Act creates no statutory presumptions (see Op. 43, R. 2125). Such decisions, therefore, do not aid petitioner's attack on the legislative findings included in the Act.

b. Petitioner's contention (Pet. 50–51) that the Act "is invalid as a bill of attainder because it identifies petitioner as the object of the statutory sanctions and imposes punishment on petitioner and its members without a judicial trial" is similarly without merit. Bills of attainder are "legislative acts * * * that apply either to named individuals or to easily ascertainable members of a group in such a way as to inflict punishment on them without a judicial trial." United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303, 315. "Punishment is a prerequisite." Garner v. Los Angeles Board, 341 U. S. 716, 722. And the conduct punished must be past conduct. American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 413–414.

The Subversive Activities Control Act is not a statute of this type. It is basically a regulatory measure requiring registration and disclosure of membership and financial data on the part of organizations which either admit being or are duly found to be within its scope (Section 7). Of course, like all registration statutes it provides criminal penalties for willful failure to register when required [7] and for making

[7] The Act provides that "each day of failure to register * * * shall constitute a separate offense" (Section 15 (a)). Petitioner complains that this makes the penalty for non-registration "potentially astronomical" (Pet. 7). It is clear, however, that there cannot be any such accumulation of penalties unless an organization chooses to incur them by willfully false registration statements (Section 15 (a) and (b)). In addition, it contains certain so-called "sanctions" (see Op. 5, R. 2087) which become applicable upon registration or final order to register. Some of these sanctions apply to covered organizations as such. For example, organizational mail and broadcasts must be labeled and identified in the manner and under the conditions specified in Section 10, in order that the public may be able to identify such mail and broadcasts as emanating from a "Communist organization." In addition, certain withholdings of legislative grace in the nature of tax benefits are provided for (Section 11). Other "sanctions" pertain to members of covered organizations. For example, after an organization has registered or been finally ordered to register, its members become ineligible for non-elective employment by the United States as well as for employment in defense facilities and with labor organizations as defined in the National Labor Relations Act (Section 5). They also become ineligible to obtain continued non-compliance after a final order. The organization is not obliged to incur liability under Section 15 (a) to test the validity of the registration requirements. Cf. Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Ry. Co. v. Texas, 246 U. S. 58, 62; Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 145–148. The duty arises only after the validity of the registration requirements has been determined and a final order has resulted. Thus, liability results only from its willful refusal to comply with a requirement laid down by Congress and upheld by the courts.

or use passports (Section 6).[8] The validity of these sanctions may possibly not be presented at the present stage (cf. Electric Bond & Share Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 303 U. S. 419, 434 et seq.), but in any case none of these have retroactive effect. By their terms they apply only to persons continuing membership in a covered organization after it has registered or been ordered to register. Since the sanctions in no sense impose disabilities for "past actions," they lack a fundamental characteristic of bills of attainder—the imposition of punishment for past conduct. American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 413–414; cf. Garner v. Los Angeles Board, supra, 341 U. S. 716, 722–723. See Op. 40, R. 2122. And, of course, with respect to such punishable acts as failure to disclose membership in seeking prohibited employment (Section 5 (a) (1)) and applying for or using a passport while continuing to be a member of a covered organization (Section 6 (a)), knowledge or notice that the organization is registered or has been ordered to register is an essential ingredient of the offense, and punishment can be imposed only after trial by jury (Section 15 (c)).

[8] In addition, if aliens, they become excludable and deportable under certain conditions (Section 22, carried forward by §§ 212 (a) (28) (E) and 241 (a) (6) (E) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of June 27, 1952; see Pet. 125–126). Such provisions are not penal in character. See Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, 529–530; cf. Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U. S. 580.

c. Petitioner next contends (Pet. 51–54, 16–18) that the Act "violates due process because it authorizes a determination that an organization is a Communist-action organization on the basis of irrational and vague criteria" (Pet. 51). The insubstantiality of this contention is forcefully demonstrated in the opinion below (Op. 40–46, R. 2122–2128). We submit that petitioner fails to show, as it claims to show, that the opinion below "begs the question" (Pet. 52). A perusal of the eight criteria listed in Section 13 (e)—and see particularly the "directives and policies" criterion of Section 13 (e) (1)—shows their rational basis as indicating types of evidence relevant to the ultimate factual issue of whether the organization meets the decisive test of a "Communist-action organization" as set forth in Section 3 (3), namely, whether it is controlled by the foreign government or organization controlling the world Communist movement and operates primarily to advance the objectives of that movement as described in Section 2. Section 13 (e) contains no formula, nor are the listed criteria in any sense exclusive. Petitioner's argument assumes that Section 13 (e) permits an organization to be held subject to registration as a Communist-action organization under the Act if it is controlled by the foreign government or organization referred to in Section 3 (3) even if all of its objectives are as "benign" (Pet. 52), say, as the improvement of race relations. This interpretation patently distorts the meaning of Sections 2, 3 (3), and 13 (e) when read together, as they must be, in determining the requirements of the Act.

2. The consequences of registration on officers and members of petitioner

a. Petitioner contends (Pet. 55–57, 8–9) that the Act "violates due process by depriving petitioner's members of liberty and property merely by reason of their association, without proof of scienter and without according them a hearing" (Pet. 55). Of course, no members are before the Court, but the contention, if properly here, is thoroughly refuted by the opinion below (Op. 25–28, R. 2107–2110). As is there pointed out, a necessary condition of the applicability of any of the Act's "sanctions" against members of an organization is knowledge or notice that the organization has registered or been finally ordered to register (Op. 25–26, R. 2107–2108). "If the organization has registered as a Communist-action organization without an order to do so, it has voluntarily agreed that it is such an organization. If a final order has been entered against it, its nature as such an organization has been determined by full administrative proceedings, fully reviewed by the courts. So notice or knowledge of registration carries knowledge or notice of the nature of the organization; its nature has been either admitted or established" (Op. 26, R. 2108). The scienter requirement of Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183, 188–191, on which decision petitioner relies (Pet. 56), is thus fully met, as the opinion below points out (Op. 27–28, R. 2109–2110).*

b. Petitioner also argues (Pet. 57–58, 7) that "the registration requirement of the Act violates due process by virtue of the fact that Section 5 of the Communist Control Act [of 1954] makes it impossible to determine who must be registered as members" (Pet. 57). This contention is based on a mistaken interpretation of Section 5 of the 1954 Act, which appears at Pet. App. 130–131. That section does not, as petitioner supposes, establish controlling "criteria for membership in the Communist Party" (Pet. 57).

The evident purpose of Section 5 of the 1954 Act is to list certain items of relevant evidence to be considered by juries under proper instructions in determining whether some one is actually a member of the Communist Party, not to lay down individual criteria of membership of which any single one might suffice. Petitioner's attempt to depict the section as a trap for the unwary—as a snare for catching as members persons who do not know they are members—cannot therefore stand analysis.[10]

* The opinion below observes that "Membership in an organization is of course a fact, and if one is actually a member he knows it" (Op. 26, R. 2108). Petitioner takes issue with this, saying, "it is not correct that 'members' [of it] have knowledge of their 'membership'" (Pet. 56–57). The argument is based, however, on a mistaken interpretation of Section 5 of the Communist Control Act of 1954, as we show in the text.

3. The requirement of registration and self-incrimination

Petitioner contends (Pet. 58–59) that the Act "is invalid because it violates the privilege against self-incrimination" (Pet. 58). "The legislative scheme of the Act," it argues, "culminates in an attempt to coerce confessions of membership in the Communist Party * * *. This is a crass violation of the privilege against self-incrimination. Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159" (Pet. 59). We submit that the majority opinion below[11] (see Op. 16–25, R. 2098–2107) convincingly shows that the question of self-incrimination is not effectively presented in this proceeding.

Most important, the privilege against self-incrimination is a personal privilege, available

[10] Petitioner's argument on this point involves the same kind of reasoning underlying its contention that the criteria of Section 13 (e) are irrational. See pp. 20–21, supra.

[11] Judge Bazelon dissented from the decision of the court below (Op. 76, R. 2158) on the ground that the Act necessarily requires individuals to disclose their own membership in a criminal conspiracy and therefore should be held invalid in this proceeding notwithstanding the fact that no official has as yet declined to register for petitioner on self-incrimination grounds.

neither to an organization as such nor (in the case of a demand for the production of an organization's records which would allegedly tend to incriminate personally members of the organization, including the officers required to produce them) to the officers of the organization having custody of its records in their representative capacity. United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694. That this principle applies to the Communist Party is clear. Rogers v. United States, 340 U. S. 367, 371–372. The rule is relevant to the case at bar. The Act, it is true, calls for the preparation and submission of a registration statement by covered organizations containing the names and addresses of officers and members and an accounting of moneys received and expended (Section 7 (d)) and not the production of physical records as such. But as the majority opinion observes, "membership lists and accountings for money furnished by an organization are reproductions of or extracts from organization records" (Op. 17, R. 2099).

Moreover, even if the White rule were considered inapplicable in the context of the instant case, it is clear that the privilege against self-incrimination would protect only the person called upon to submit the registration statement, and would protect him only in so far as his own name was involved; that is, he could not under the guise of protecting himself against self-incrimination seek to shield others.

We recognize, as did the court below (Op. 19, R. 2101), that the official of petitioner who filed the registration statement (see Section 7 (h)) would by the act of filing, even if he were to omit his own name from the membership list, be admitting that he is a member and an officer of petitioner. But this does not mean, as the majority point out (Op. 19–23, R. 2101–2105), that the statute or the order requiring petitioner to register is invalid.

In the first place, it is well settled that the privilege against self-incrimination is a privilege which must be personally and explicitly claimed. Rogers v. United States, supra, 340 U. S. 367, 370; United States v. Monia, 317 U. S. 424, 427; United States v. Murdock, 284 U. S. 141, 148; Vajtauer v. Commissioner of Immigration, 273 U. S. 103, 113. The question as to the effect of the privilege will not arise until the order of the Board becomes final and petitioner is required to register.

Secondly, it cannot be assumed at this time that a claim of privilege will inevitably be made when petitioner is confronted by the statutory requirement that it register, so that (according to the argument) the constitutionality of the requirement should be settled in this proceeding. This argument not only runs counter to the settled rule of deferring decision of constitutional questions until they are ripe for review, but is particularly inappropriate in this case since, as the majority opinion observes, the top officials of petitioner, who would be the ones called on to file the registration statement (see Section 7 (h)), "have never attempted to conceal their membership or their places of leadership" (Op. 20, R. 2102). Hence there is "no basis for assuming that they would claim protection against a mere revelation of their [own] membership" (ibid.).[12]

A question which might also arise if a future claim of privilege should be made (see Op. 22–23, R. 2104–2105), is as to the possible effect, if invoked by the Attorney General, of the new immunity statute on the claim (see 18 U. S. C. 3486 (c), as created by the Act of August 20, 1954, c. 769, § 1, 68 Stat. 745).[13]

Accordingly, while we recognize the importance of the underlying issue, we think the court below was correct when it concluded (Op. 23, R. 2105) that neither the Act nor the order requiring an organization as such to register can be held

[12] As pointed out in the dissenting opinion below (Op. 86, R. 2168, n. 39), one of the grounds urged by petitioner in a suit which it brought to enjoin the proceedings before the Board was that "to properly defend itself at such hearings Communist Party officials would necessarily have to testify and that such testimony would necessarily entail their admission of Communist Party affiliations." After its suit to enjoin the proceedings was denied, officials of petitioner did appear and testify at the Board hearings (see R. 136 [2049]).

[13] If a claim of privilege should in fact be made in connection with the registration of petitioner, questions might also arise as to whether the claim should be rejected under the principle of waiver. See Op. 20–22, R. 2102–2104. Cf. Rogers v. United States, 340 U. S. 367, 372–373.

invalid because of the possibility that questions as to the availability of the privilege to an officer or member of the organization might arise under various hypothetical future situations.

Petitioner challenges the Act as violative of First Amendment freedoms (Pet. 59–66, 7–11). Inasmuch as the Court of Appeals analyzed this contention in all its aspects (Op. 10–16, 32–38, R. 2092–2098, 2114–2120), we need not go over the same ground here. The court below reasoned, inter alia, that "if Congress, in order to protect interstate commerce, can validly deny the privileges of union office to members of the Communist Party because of the program of that Party [as held in American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382], it can, in order to protect the Government itself, impose restrictions upon adherents of a world Communist movement such as that described in this statute" (Op. 15, R. 2097).

The Act is fundamentally a registration statute requiring the disclosure of certain information—principally relating to membership and finances—by local action organizations under the control and domination of a foreign power and operating primarily to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement, which Congress has found and declared after due investigation to pose a threat to the national security. Reasonable disclosure requirements have never been thought to be inconsistent with First Amendment freedoms. See United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 625–6; Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236; Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, 290 U. S. 534, 545; Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U. S. 63, 72–73; Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 229 U. S. 288, 313–316. In the light of the legislative findings set forth in Section 2, the Act's disclosure requirements are clearly reasonable. The so-called "sanctions" (see pp. 18–19, supra) imposed by the Act on organizations subject to its terms (see Op. 35–36, 38, R. 2117–2118, 2120) and on members of such organizations (see Op. 33–35, 36–37, R. 2115–2117, 2118–2119) are, as the court below held, "reasonably related to the substantive evil at which Congress was aiming" (Op. 32, R. 2114). Moreover, as we have seen, these sanctions operate only in futuro, and only as to members having knowledge that the organization has registered or been finally ordered to register. Members, by bona fide resignation, can escape them. Cf. American Communications Assn. v. Douds, supra, 339 U. S. 382, 413–414.

Underlying the present contention of petitioner in all its facets is the charge that the Act unlawfully abridges "innocent and lawful advocacy and assembly" (Pet. 61) as well as "seditious advocacy" (Pet. 63). But apart from the labeling requirements of Section 10, the Act imposes no restrictions on covered organizations' freedom to issue literature or to broadcast propaganda. And the labeling provisions are reasonable adjuncts to the basic disclosure requirements. As the court below remarked, "surely the people are entitled to know when an organization which falls within the definition of a Communist-action organization in this statute is addressing them over the air" (Op. 36, R. 2118). And the same is true with respect to the circularization of mail matter. Congress has the power to compel disclosure of facts which every citizen has the right to know. Petitioner's exhortations to the effect that such identification constitutes a prior restraint on its activities is simply an admission that it cannot secure adherents unless it can camouflage its activities. Certainly, the Communist Party cannot object to having its views labelled as those of "the Communist Party, a Communist organization." [14]

[14] In its effort to depict the Act as violative of the First Amendment, petitioner has been compelled to distort it. For example:

(1) It says, "the Act and the order suppress all of petitioner's activities" (Pet. 60). This is patently not so, as we have shown.

(2) It refers to the Act as having accomplished "the proscription of peaceful advocacy and assembly by outlawing" covered organizations (Pet. 61). The Act does not proscribe peaceful advocacy and does not outlaw any organizations.

(3) It says that the Act "forecloses employment to a member" (Pet. 62). The Act forecloses certain kinds of em-

B. The proceeding before the Board

Petitioner attacks the adequacy of the proceedings before the Board and in the court below in a number of respects, all of which are insubstantial and present no questions calling for review by this Court.

1. Petitioner contends (Pet. 66–68) that "[t]he action of the court below in sustaining the order of the Board after striking two of the key findings on which it was based violates the Act and is in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court" (Pet. 66). The case should have been remanded to the Board, it is argued, "for administrative redetermination in the light of the findings which survived" (Pet. 67). The contenployment (see Section 5) to members of covered organizations under certain conditions.

(4) It says that the Act punishes "'non-deviation' from Soviet views" (Pet. 65). The Act establishes "non-deviation" as one of eight listed (but not exclusive) guides to the consideration of evidence (Section 13 (e)) to be taken into consideration in determining whether an organization is a "Communist-action organization" as defined in Section 3 (3).

(5) It says, "The listing or self-listing of members of petitioner in compliance with a registration order has been made an impossible task by Section 5 of the Communist Control Act" (Pet. 7). We have previously shown how this charge is based on a distortion of the cited section (supra, pp. 22–23).

(6) It says that an organization which "has any dealings with" a Communist-action organization or members thereof "is itself in danger of being proscribed as a front or infiltrated organization" (Pet. 10). The sections of the Act cited in support of this sweeping charge—Sections 13 (f) and 13A (e)—manifestly fail to do so.

tion is clearly insubstantial, as will be evident from an appreciation of just what the Court of Appeals' "striking" of "two of the key findings" of the Board actually consisted of.

With respect to the Board's subsidiary finding that petitioner "reports to the Soviet Union and its representatives" (R. 98 [1982]; see Section 13 (e) (5) of the Act), the Court of Appeals said (Op. 72, R. 2154):

> * * * There is little doubt about these reports having been made when the Party was a member of the International * * *. There is some doubt that a preponderance of the evidence supports the broad conclusion that the Party "reports to the Soviet Union and its representatives." Such a conclusion seems to imply constant, systematic reporting as of now. The evidence indicates instances, as in the cases of Eisler and Peters. On this record we would strike this finding as phrased. There is a preponderance of evidence, we think, to support a conclusion that upon occasion leaders of the Party report to representatives of the Soviet Union. [Emphasis supplied.]

The other "key finding" of the Board which the court below "struck" was its subsidiary finding relating to "secret practices" of petitioner (see Section 13 (e) (7)). After reviewing the long history of such practices (R. 105-116 [1993-2012]) and after considering the evidence relating to their "purpose" (R. 116–117 [2012–2015]), the Board concluded that (R. 117 [2015]):

> * * * the secret practices undertaken by [petitioner] are for the purpose of concealing the true nature of the Party and promoting its objectives. We cannot accept [petitioner's] contention that its secret practices are merely devices utilized to protect the rights and liberties of its members. [Emphasis supplied.]

With respect to this finding the Court of Appeals said (Op. 73–74, R. 2155–2156):

> This question, whether the secret practices of the Party are for the purpose of protecting the liberties of the members or are for the purpose of promoting the objectives of the Party, is a nebulous one. The two purposes may well overlap. * * * [B]oth purposes could exist together. In a doubtful situation such as that on this point, we strike the finding as to purpose. At the same time we are of opinion that the Party's view of the limited purpose of secrecy is not shown by a preponderance of the evidence. On this point we conclude simply that a defined purpose is not proven. [Emphasis supplied.]

It is clear from the above that what the court below actually did was merely to modify two of the Board's eight subsidiary findings. The other six subsidiary findings were held to be fully supported by a preponderance of the evidence. The court also found that the Board's ultimate finding of fact—that petitioner "is substantially directed, dominated, and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement * * *; and * * * operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement" (R. 132 [2042])—was likewise fully supported by a preponderance of the evidence (Op. 75–76, R. 2157–2158). In these circumstances affirmance of the Board's order was plainly the correct action. Cf. Universal Camera Co. v. N. L. R. B., 340 U. S. 474, 488; N. L. R. B. v. Nevada Copper Corp., 316 U. S. 105; Foreman & Clark, Inc. v. N. L. R. B., 215 F. 2d 396, 398 (C. A. 9), certiorari denied, 348 U. S. 887.[15]

2. Petitioner's contention that the Board placed too much reliance on pre-Act evidence in reaching its conclusion that petitioner is a Communist action organization within the Act's meaning

[15] The cases cited by petitioner (Pet. 67–68) are all clearly distinguishable. This is not a case in which it is unclear from the record on just what evidence the administrative findings are based (N. L. R. B. v. Virginia Power Co., 314 U. S. 469, 479); nor one in which the administrative order would be sustainable if based on grounds which the record shows were not the actual grounds on which it was based (S. E. C. v. Chenery Corp., 318 U. S. 80, 94–95); nor one in which the reviewing court modified an administrative order (F. P. C. v. Idaho Power Co., 344 U. S. 17, 20–21); nor one in which the administrative findings are "so shrouded in doubt" that the basis of the agency's action is not determinable (Colorado-Wyoming Gas Co. v. F. P. C., 324 U. S. 626, 634–635).

(Pet. 68–71) is also without merit. As the court below observed, "The past is clearly pertinent to the present nature of a person or an organization. Surely a person's education and experience are pertinent to his present nature. The same is true of an organization" (Op. 63, R. 2145). For this reason, contrary to petitioner's arguments (Pet. 68, 71), the Board was manifestly correct when it said (R. 130 [2038]):

> In reaching our conclusion herein we have considered and weighed commensurately * * * such pre-Act evidence as reasonably tends to establish or illuminate the present nature, activities, character, and status of [petitioner] in connection with the issues presented for decision. * * * We have been able to trace [petitioner's] operations over more than thirty years into the present and have found that at no time during this period has [petitioner] changed its fundamental objectives, or its nature and purpose. * * *
> It would have been unwarranted by law to compel [the Government] to restrict its proof to fragmentary evidence confined to a relatively minute portion of [petitioner's] existence, i. e., the two-month period between the passage of the Act and the filing of the [Government's] petition. * * *

See Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 703–706; United States v.

Petitioner's insistence that its formal disaffiliation with the Communist International in 1940 made that year some sort of cut-off date from an evidential standpoint (Pet. 69, 70) is unavailing. As the court below observed, "The disaffiliation was an organizational separation. The international organization itself was disbanded in 1943, but the world Communist movement did not then cease to exist" (Op. 64, R. 2146).[17]

3. Petitioner next contends (Pet. 71–75, 27–33) that the Board and the court below "erroneously construed and applied" (Pet. 71) four of the evidentiary criteria enumerated in Section 13 (e) of the Act, namely, the "directives and policies," "non-deviation," "discipline," and "allegiance" criteria (paragraphs (1), (2), (6), and (8), respectively, of Section 13 (e)). The contention is without merit.

a. "Directives and policies" (Pet. 72–73, 27–28). Section 13 (e) (1) provides that in determining whether an organization is a "Communist-action organization" the Board shall take into consideration "the extent to which its policies are formulated and carried out and its activities performed, pursuant to directives or to effectuate the policies of the foreign government or foreign organization in which is vested, or under the domination or control of which is exercised, the direction and control of the world Communist movement referred to in section 2" (emphasis supplied). The Board devoted some seventy pages of its Report (R. 9–79 [1819–1948]) to a review and analysis of the evidence pertinent to this heading. Petitioner, ignoring the "policies" half of the criterion, cites two statements from this passage (Pet. 28) as establishing that the Board, erroneously and absurdly, adopted "[t]he thesis that a century-old, constantly evolving system of political thought, developed by thinkers of many nations and based on a comprehensive view of man and nature [Marxism-Leninism], constitutes a series of Soviet 'directives' [to petitioner]" (Pet. 72). Petitioner emphasizes the absurdity of the "thesis" which it thus attributes to the Board by pointing out that "much of the literature from which the Board draws this conclusion was written long before there was a Soviet Union" (Pet. 28, fn. 31). We submit that the statements in question,[18] when read in their proper context, fail completely to support petitioner's extravagant contention. Their immediate context shows that it was "Marxism-Leninism, as understood, used and followed by [petitioner]" about which the Board was speaking. These concepts, which are carefully elaborated in the Board's Report, cogently support the Board's findings under this heading.

[16] Petitioner's attempted distinction of the Dennis case (Pet. 71) is unavailing. In the present case as well as in Dennis, the acts performed prior to the critical period were treated as "media concludendi" as distinguished from "the factum itself." See, e. g., the passage from the Board's Report quoted in the text, supra, p. 34.

[17] Petitioner admits that the only reason for its 1940 disaffiliation with the Communist International was "to avoid the registration requirements of the then newly enacted Voorhis Act" (Pet. 24–25).

b. "Non-deviation" (Pet. 73–74, 28–31). The Board found that "the views and policies of [petitioner] throughout its history invariably coincide with the views and policies of the Soviet Union. Moreover, [petitioner] conforms immediately to each reversal in the Soviet Union's views and policies" (R. 86 [1959]), and concluded that "[petitioner's] views and policies do not deviate from those of the Soviet Union" (ibid.). The overwhelming evidence supporting this finding is summarized in the Board's Report at R. 79–86 [1948–1959] and is more briefly reviewed in the opinion below at Op. 68–69, R. 2150–2151. Petitioner, however, urges that such evidence is insignificant and meaningless unless it appears that in each instance the view it shared with the Soviet Union (1) was adopted by it after its adoption by the Soviet Union, (2) did not emanate from a common philosophy, and (3) was not "legitimate," i. e., "calculated to promote the peace and well-being of the United States" (Pet. 73–74, 29–30). Hence, it argues, the Board misconstrued Congress' meaning in establishing the "non-deviation" criterion of Section 13 (e) (2). We think it clear, however, that it is petitioner which has misconstrued the congressional meaning. We submit that the court below was correct in saying that "[t]he statutory phrase refers to identity or coincidence and not to chronological adoption" (Op. 69, R. 2151). It is true, as petitioner says (Pet. 73), that shared views in such fields as mathematics are without evidential significance with respect to questions of domination and control. But the fact that petitioner, in conformity with Soviet views, denounced Fascism in Nazi Germany as a peace menace until the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939, following which it about-faced and, with the Soviet Union, hailed the Pact as an outstanding contribution to world peace (see R. 82 [1953]; Op. 68, R. 2150), is evidence of a different character. The evidence in this case was of the latter, not the former type. Petitioner here, as elsewhere in its petition (see supra, pp. 20–21, 22–23), reads one evidential criterion as though it were the ultimate criterion, whereas in fact it refers to but one of many types of evidence which the statute directs the Board to consider in reaching its final determination. For this reason petitioner's suggestion that so far as the non-deviation evidence is concerned it may be the Soviet Union which follows petitioner's views rather than vice versa (Pet. 73) cannot be taken seriously.[19]

[18] The statements relied on by petitioner (Pet. 28) are as follows: (1) "Consequently, we conclude that the [Marxist-Leninist] classics are one of the chief means by which the CPSU directs, dominates, and controls the CPUSA" (R. 43 [1881]); (2) "Marxism-Leninism, as understood, used, and followed by [petitioner], consists of a body of doctrine, policies, strategies, and tactics intended to bring about the end of capitalism and to substitute for it a dictatorship of the proletariat; it has been promulgated and issued by the Soviet Union as the overall philosophy, authoritative rules, directives, and instructions governing the world Communist movement" (R. 78 [1946]).

c. "Discipline" and "Allegiance" (Pet. 74–75, 31–33). The evidence relevant to the "discipline" and "allegiance" criteria is summarized by the Board at R. 98–104 [1982–1993] and R. 118–128 [2016–2034], respectively, and is more briefly reviewed in the opinion below at Op. 72–73, R. 2154–2155, and Op. 74–75, R. 2156–2157, respectively. A cursory perusal of these passages will indicate, contrary to petitioner's contention, that neither the Board nor the Court of Appeals misconstrued or misapplied those criteria, as set forth in Section 13 (e) (6) and (8), respectively. The contention (Pet. 75) that the Board's finding on [19] The suggestion also fails to take account of some of the non-deviation evidence itself, notably the evidence that petitioner's overnight change of view as to the justness of the war against Germany followed the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941 (see R. 82–83 [1953]; Op. 68, R. 2150). Cf. its prompt change of view, referred to in the text, coinciding with the Hitler-Stalin pact.

"allegiance,"[20] as approved by the court below (Op. 75, R. 2157), conflicts with Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, is plainly without merit. That was a denaturalization case in which documents published after 1927, when Schneiderman was naturalized, were regarded by the Court as being entitled to "little weight" (320 U. S. at 147, 151–152). In the instant case, on the other hand, the Board had before it evidence as to petitioner's interpretation of Marxism-Leninism in the form of conduct and writings extending over a period of more than 30 years, and the testimony of witnesses who held high positions in petitioner for varying numbers of years. This proof established that the Marxist-Leninist classics are used to instill within members of petitioner a loyalty and devotion to the Soviet Union as the "fatherland" of the world-wide Communist revolution as well as to train them for their part in the overthrow of the "imperialist" Government of the United States. Cf. Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 516–517.

4. Petitioner's contention (Pet. 75–76, 34–36) that the Board and the court below "erroneously construed and applied the Act's definition of the world Communist movement" (Pet. 75) is based, as petitioner admits (Pet. 76), on the assumption that the existence of a "world Communist movement" as found by Congress in Section 2 of the Act was subject to redetermination in the administrative proceeding before the Board. But this assumption is untenable, as the court below held (Op. 56, R. 2138; see pp. 13–16, supra). Consequently, it is unnecessary to deal with the present contention. The Board, it is true, deemed it desirable to make an independent finding on the matter based on the evidence before it (R. 4 [1809]). Accordingly it reviewed such evidence (R. 4–9 [1809–1818]) and found that "there exists a world Communist movement, substantially as described in Section 2 of the Act" (R. 9 [1818]). The Court of Appeals, following a review of a "few bits of" the pertinent evidence (Op. 56–61, R. 2138–2143), held that this finding was "supported by a clear preponderance of the evidence" (Op. 61, R. 2143). We submit that the Board's finding is clearly correct. The evidence established far more than "the presence in various countries of the world" of what petitioner describes as "Communist parties which adhere to a common ideology" (Pet. 75). It showed the existence of a world-wide movement, substantially as described in Section 2 of the Act (R. 4–9 [1809–1818]).

5. Finally, petitioner's overall challenge of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the Board's findings and order (Pet. 78–79, 22) is manifestly without merit. The Board, following a thorough review and analysis of the evidence on both sides, found petitioner to be a Communist-action organization within the Act's definition "[u]pon the overwhelming weight of the evidence" (supra, pp. 5-6). Its report contains a very thorough summary of the evidence, logically arranged under appropriate headings and subheadings (R. 1–137; R. 1803–2051 (annotated report)). The Court of Appeals, in discharge of its statutory obligation to ascertain that the Board's findings were supported, not merely by substantial evidence, but by "the preponderance of the evidence" (Section 14 (a)), has likewise carefully reviewed the evidence (Op. 48–76, R. 2130–2158) and found that, with the exception of the two subsidiary findings which it modified in the respects already noted (supra, pp. 30–33), the Board's findings were clearly supported by the required quantum of evidence. In view of the substantial concurrence of the Court of Appeals in the Board's findings, there is no occasion for further review by this Court of the sufficiency of the evidence.[21]

[21] Petitioner asserts that "[u]nimpeached documentary evidence established that many of [the Government's] witnesses perjured themselves in the proceeding before the Board" (Pet. 22). The record references cited in support of this sweeping charge, however (Pet. 22, fn. 21), fail to bear it out. At most they reveal the highly argumentative character of the assertion. Typical of the instances of alleged perjury to which petitioner alludes (see R. 1178–1180) is Budenz' testimony on direct examination that Eugene Den-

C. The attack on the Board as biased

1. Petitioner attacks the validity of the proceeding before the Board on the ground that the Board was "necessarily biased" against it (Pet. 54–55, 18–20). "The Board is set up," runs the argument, "as a permanent agency, which originally had the sole function of identifying Communist-action organizations, their members, and Communist-front organizations. Since Communist-front organizations are by definition tools of a Communist-action organization, they can exist only if the Board finds that there is an action organization" (Pet. 19). And since the Act contemplates "the existence in the United States of only one Communist-action organization, the petitioner," the argument concludes, "[i]t is clear * * * that if the Board had decided that the petitioner was not a Communist-action organization, it would have rendered itself functus officio" (ibid.).

We submit that there is no need for this Court to enter this area of inference and conjecture. It nis, at a certain meeting in the fall or winter of 1939–40, had said that the Communist Party should be prepared, in case the United States entered the war on Britain's side, to "turn the imperialist war into a civil war" (R. 1178). Petitioner's "proof" that this testimony was perjurious consists of Budenz' concession on cross-examination that in his book, This is My Story, he wrote that Dennis had said at the meeting in question that the Party should "turn the imperialist war into something else" (R. 1179–1180). Budenz explained, however, that Dennis made both statements at the meeting (R. 1178–1179).

has refused to impute on the theory of constructive bias a dishonest or interested point of view to government employee-jurors in cases to which the Government is a party, including criminal prosecutions of admitted Communists. Dennis v. United States, 339 U. S. 162; Frazier v. United States, 335 U. S. 497; United States v. Wood, 299 U. S. 123. There is no more reason to believe that Board members would violate their oaths of office in a proceeding of this type, which is essentially what according to petitioner's contention the Board members were bound to do. This Court has said, "We cannot agree that courts should assume in advance that an administrative hearing may not be fairly conducted." Fahey v. Mallonee, 332 U. S. 245, 256; see also Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 700–703; N. L. R. B. v. Air Associates, 121 F. 2d 586 (C. A. 2). This is especially true where full opportunity for judicial review is afforded by the Act. See Fahey v. Mallonee, supra, 332 U. S. at 256; Marquette Cement Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 147 F. 2d 589, 594 (C. A. 7). Moreover, a full and fair hearing was afforded in this case.[22]

2. Equally without merit is petitioner's contention (Pet. 55, 38–40) that it was in fact denied a fair hearing by virtue of the refusal of Board members McHale and Brown to disqualify themselves for alleged bias. The short speech of Dr. McHale which she made during the course of the hearings and which allegedly manifested her bias against petitioner and prejudgment of the issues appears at R. 193–196. We submit that the remarks of Dr. McHale of which petitioner complains (Pet. 39), when read in context, fail to support the contention that she had prejudged the case. The reference to the Hitler-Stalin Pact, which petitioner claims was a prejudgment on the issue of "non-deviation" (Pet. 39), was merely an explanation of what had moved Congress to act, not an explanation of her own belief in the matter (see R. 193–194). Her reference to the congressional finding of the existence of a world Communist movement (R. 194) was nothing more than a statement of publicly known facts and does not indicate any bias on her part.

[22] The remaining aspects of this contention—that the members of the Board "had to rule against petitioner" for financial and patronage reasons (Pet. 20, 54)—involve presumptions which the courts have refused to indulge.

The appearance of Board Chairman Brown on a television program in which he discussed the case, and which petitioner claims showed his bias against it (Pet. 39), occurred after he and Dr. McHale, constituting the hearing panel, had handed down their recommended decision in the case (see his affidavit, R. 206–208, and the Board's memorandum opinion, R. 209–211). It scarcely amounts to bias and prejudice for the Board member to have repeated publicly what he had already made a matter of record—that on the evidence he had heard he believed petitioner to be a Communist-action organization within the meaning of the Act. He simply repeated the substance of the panel's findings already made and published.[23]

Petitioner contends (Pet. 76–78, 40–41) that the Court of Appeals "violated section 14 of the Act by denying petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence" before the Board (Pet. 76). The contention is without merit.

Section 14 (a) provides that "[i]f either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board * * *." Such applications are addressed to the sound judical discretion of the court. See N. L. R. B. v. I. & M. Electric Co., 318 U. S. 9, 16, and Southport Petroleum Co. v. N. L. R. B., 315 U. S. 100, 104, so holding with respect to the like provision of the National Labor Relations Act. Petitioner fails to show that the Court of Appeals abused its discretion in denying petitioner's motion in this case. The motion, which in substance alleged that three of the Government's twenty-two witnesses gave false testimony before the Board, appears in the record at R. 2053–2068. The Board's memorandum in opposition appears at R. 2069–2079. The Board's memorandum pointed out, inter alia, on the basis of the record of the proceedings before the Board, that the testimony of the three witnesses in question could "be ignored in toto and the ultimate determination of the Board will remain amply supported by evidence both testimonial and documentary in character" (R. 2073). It concluded as follows (R. 2078–2079):

> It should be borne in mind that the conclusion of the Board that the petitioner is a Communist-action organization * * * is arrived at on the basis of a number of subsidiary findings which comport with the criteria set forth in section 13 (e) of the Act. These subsidiary findings in turn depend upon a vast number of individual findings of fact. Were the testimony of [the three witnesses in question] entirely absent from the record, a relatively few of the myriad individual findings might be disturbed. The effect could be no greater. It is nonsense to maintain that the result would be in any way changed. The petitioner would still be found a Communist-action organization by overwhelming evidence. A hearing should not be reopened > for the reception of evidence which could not change the result. * * *

It is evident, we submit, that in the light of these considerations, which were fully supported by references to the record, the Court of Appeals properly exercised its discretion in declining to reopen and remand the case. See United States v. Elizabeth Gurley Flynn (S. D. N. Y., motion to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, decided April 22, 1955), in which District Judge Dimock denied a new trial as to eleven of thirteen defendants convicted under the Smith Act, on the ground that, disregarding entirely the testimony of Harvey Matusow, subsequently claimed by Matusow to have been perjured, there was no reasonable possibility that the jury's verdict would have been different. Cf. N. L. R. B. v. J. S. Popper, Inc., 113 F. 2d 602, 604 (C. A. 3).

E. The validity of the appointments of members of the Board

Petitioner challenges the legality of the appointment of three of the Board members—Brown, McHale, and Coddaire—for the period between their original recess appointment by the President on October 23, 1950, and their confirmation by the Senate on August 9, 1951 (which petitioner concedes was legal) (Pet. 80–83). We submit that the challenge is without substance and, further, that even if technically worthy of consideration, it would be irrelevant in the circumstances of this case. The relevant facts are as follows:

On September 23, 1950, the Second Session of the 81st Congress enacted the Subversive Activities Control Act by passing it over a Presidential veto (see 64 Stat. 1031) and adjourned on the same day pursuant to a concurrent resolution of both Houses to a day certain, namely, November 27, 1950 (96 Cong. Rec. 15726). On October 23, 1950, the President, by recess appointments, appointed five members to the Board, including Brown, McHale, and Coddaire. On November 27, 1950, the Second Session of the 81st Congress reconvened pursuant to the resolution of adjournment, and the President transmitted to the Senate his nominations of the Board members (96 Cong. Rec. 15785). On January 2, 1951, the Second Session of the 81st Congress adjourned sine die (96 Cong. Rec. 17121, 17138) without the Senate having acted on the nominations. On the following day, January 3, 1951, the First Session of the 82d Congress convened, and on February 12, 1951, the President resubmitted the nominations to the Senate for confirmation (97 Cong. Rec. 1228). On April 23, 1951, hearings for the purpose of taking evidence in this proceeding commenced before a hearing panel of three Board members, including Brown and McHale (R. 1). On August 9, 1951, the nominations of Brown, McHale, and Coddaire were confirmed by the Senate (97 Cong. Rec. 9702).

Petitioner contends first that the recess appointments of October 23, 1950, were invalid ab initio, with the consequence that, allegedly, the members in question did not validly became members of the Board until their confirmation by the Senate on August 9, 1951, following the resubmission of their nominations on February 12, 1951, during the First Session of the 82d Congress (Pet. 81). Alternatively it argues that even assuming the recess appointments were valid originally they expired with the expiration of the Second Session of the 81st Congress on January 2, 1951, without the Senate having acted on them (ibid.); under this view there was a hiatus in the challenged members' membership from the latter date until August 9, 1951, when they were finally confirmed. Under either view, it is argued, they were "usurpers" (Pet. 82) at least from January 2, 1951, to August 9, 1951, during which period proceedings were conducted by the Board, including the beginning of the taking of testimony before a panel which included two of the members in question. We submit that neither branch of this contention has merit; that the recess appointments were valid when made and remained valid at all times thereafter until final Senate confirmation.

The contention that the recess appointments were invalid ab initio is based on three alternative arguments.

First, it is contended, no "vacancies" had "happened" within the meaning of the constitutional provision conferring power on the President to "fill up" such vacancies "during the Recess of the Senate" (Art. II, sec. 2, cl. 3).[24] According to the argument, "[t]he term 'vacancies' as used in this clause refers to those occurring by reason of death, resignation, promotion or removal. No vacancy 'happens' in the constitutional sense when an office is newly created by law" (Pet. 81). It is obvious, however, that this construction would frustrate to an important degree the purpose of the constitutional provision, which is to enable the business of government to be carried on through temporary appointments during periods when the Senate is not available to act on nominations to office. Hence this aspect of petitioner's contention is clearly without merit. 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 455; 18 Op. Atty. Gen. 28; 19 Op. Atty. Gen. 261.

Secondly, it is argued, "even if the vacancies on the Board 'happened,' they arose simultaneously with the passage of the Act while the Senate was in session and therefore did not happen 'during the Recess'" (Pet. 81). This prong of the argument is equally invalid. "The constitution does not look to the moment of the origin of the vacancy, but to the state of things at the point of time at which the President is called on to act. Is the Senate in session? Then he must make a nomination to that body. Is it in recess? Then the President must fill the vacancy by a temporary commission." 1 Op. Atty. Gen. 631, 633.[25]

Thirdly, it is argued, "the Recess" contemplated by the constitutional clause "means the recess sine die following an annual or extraordinary session of Congress. It does not include the period following an adjournment to a day certain such as the period of the adjournment of the 81st Congress from September 23 to November 27, 1950" (Pet. 81). Hence, according to the argument, the appointments of October 23, 1950, were invalid as "recess appointments" because not made during a "Recess of the Senate." This contention is also without merit. Intrasessional adjournments to a day certain as well as sine die adjournments between sessions are recesses within the meaning of the clause. Gould v. United States, 19 Ct. Cl. 593, 595–596; 33 Op. Atty. Gen. 20; 5 Hind's Precedents of the House of Representatives, § 6687; cf. The Pocket Veto Case, 279

[25] Followed in In re Farrow, 3 Fed. 112 (C. C., N. D. Ga.); 2 Op. Atty. Gen. 525; 3 Op. Atty. Gen. 673; 10 Op. Atty. Gen. 356; 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 32; 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 455; 14 Op. Atty. Gen. 562; 15 Op. Atty. Gen. 207; 16 Op. Atty. Gen. 538; 18 Op. Atty. Gen. 28, 29; 19 Op. Atty. Gen. 261; 30 Op. Atty. Gen. 314; 33 Op. Atty. Gen. 20.

U. S. 655, 686; Wright v. United States, 302 U. S. 583.[26]

Equally without merit is petitioner's alternative argument that "if the adjournment of Congress from September 23 to November 27, 1950 was in fact 'the Recess,' then the sitting of the Senate that commenced on the latter date must have been its 'next Session,'" with the consequence, it is argued, that "the appointments expired on January 2, 1951 when the 'next session' ended upon the sine die adjournment of the 81st Congress" (Pet. 81). The sitting from November 27, 1950, to January 2, 1951, was merely a continuation of the same session (Second Session of the 81st Congress) following an ad interim adjournment to a day certain. The "next Session" was the First Session of the 82d Congress, which did not begin until January 3, 1951. Since according to the terms of the constitutional clause recess appointments do not expire until "the End" of the "next Session," the recess appointments here in issue remained valid at all times up to final Senate confirmation during this "next Session." Gould v. United States, supra, 19 Ct. Cl. 593, 595–596; see Gilfry, Senate Precedents, 1789–1913, p. 30; 5 Hind's Precedents of the [26] See also the Report of the Senate Judiciary Committee presented March 2, 1905, in response to a Senate Resolution calling upon it to construe the clause in question (Sen. Rep. No. 4389, 58th Cong., 3d sess., reproduced at 39 Cong. Rec. 3823–3824).

House of Representatives, §§ 6676–6687; 20 Op. Atty. Gen. 503.

In any event, even if there were technical merit in any of petitioner's contentions, the validity of the Board's final order would not be affected. As the court below observed (Op. 48, R. 2130):

> The appointments were indubitably valid from August 9, 1951. The taking of evidence, which began April 23, 1951, did not conclude until July 1, 1952. The evidence was taken by a panel of members, but it could have been taken by a hearing examiner (Section 13 (c) of the Act) and not by a member at all. * * * All findings and conclusions were adopted by a properly confirmed Board after hearing before that Board. The order therefore would be valid regardless of the technical legal status of the members as members prior to formal Senate confirmation.

CONCLUSION

While the case is of course one of importance, it was decided correctly below and there is no conflict of decisions involved. The petition for a writ of certiorari should therefore be denied. If, however, because of the importance of the interests involved, the Court determines to issue the writ, we urge that it be limited to those questions involving the constitutionality of the Act which are adequately presented on this record and of sufficient merit to call for consideration by this Court at this time.

No. 48

COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PETITIONER

v.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENT

OPINIONS BELOW

The majority (Op. 1–76, R. 2078–2153)[1] and dissenting (Op. 76–89, R. 2153–2166) opinions in the Court of Appeals are reported at 223 F. 2d

[1] "R." will be used to refer to the printed record, which consists of the Joint Appendix to the parties' briefs in the Court of Appeals and the proceedings in that court. "Tr." will be used, where necessary, to refer to the original typewritten transcript of the proceedings and evidence before the Subversive Activities Control Board. For the Court's convenience, references to the opinions in the Court of Appeals will include both the "R." reference and the page number or numbers of the pamphlet copy (which we shall indicate by "Op.").

531. The Report of the Subversive Activities Control Board appears at R. 1–137 [1803–2051].[2]

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on December 23, 1954 (R. 2167), and a petition for rehearing was denied on January 14, 1955 (ibid.). The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed on April 13, 1955, and was granted on May 31, 1955 (R. 2169). The jurisdiction of this Court rests on 28 U. S. C. § 1254 and § 14 (a) of the Subversive Activities Control Act (see Pet. Br. 260–261).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

The questions urged, some of which, however, as we suggest in this brief, may be premature at this time, are:

1. Whether the hearing and registration provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act,

as applied to petitioner, violate the First Amendment.

2. Whether the registration provisions of the Act and the Board's order directing petitioner to register as a Communist-action organization are invalid as violative of the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against compulsory self-incrimination.

3. Whether the registration provisions violate due process on the ground that, allegedly,—

(a) the Act predetermines by legislative fiat petitioner's liability to registration so as to render the proceedings before the Board a mere formality;

(b) the Act establishes a Board which is necessarily biased against petitioner;

(c) the Act authorizes a determination that an organization is a Communist-action organization on the basis of irrational or vague criteria or presumptions;

(d) under § 5 of the Communist Control Act of 1954 it is impossible for petitioner to know whom to register as members; and

(e) the Act makes possible an "astronomical accumulation" of penalties by making each day of failure to register a separate offense.

4. Whether the sanction provisions of the Act, individually or collectively, together with the registration provisions, violate the First Amendment by in effect "outlawing" petitioner and thus suppressing and restricting its freedom of "peaceful," "non-seditious" political advocacy.

5. Whether the member-sanction provisions of the Act deprive petitioner's members of due process by penalizing innocent and unknowing memberships and associations.

6. Whether the sanction provisions make of the Act a bill of attainder.

7. Whether the Board and the court below correctly construed and applied the evidentiary considerations enumerated in § 13 (e) of the Act, which the Board is directed to take into consideration in determining whether an organization is a Communist-action organization.

8. Whether the Board's finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization is based upon past conduct of petitioner which was discontinued prior to the date of the Act, or whether it is based upon proof as to its current practices and activities as illuminated by its past history.

9. Whether the Board's conclusion that there exists a world Communist movement, having the characteristics described in § 2 of the Act, is, as held by the Court of Appeals, supported by the preponderance of the evidence.

10. Whether the Board's findings are supported by relevant, competent evidence, and whether the Court of Appeals correctly affirmed the Board's order, notwithstanding the fact that it modified two of the subsidiary findings of the Board.

11. Whether petitioner was accorded a fair hearing before the Board.

12. Whether the Court of Appeals properly exercised its discretion in denying petitioner's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board.

13. Whether the recess appointments of three of the members of the Board were valid originally and continued to be valid until Senate confirmation of their nominations during the next session of Congress, and whether in any event the order under review is valid, it being undisputed that the Board was properly constituted at the time of the order and from a date early in the course of the hearings herein.

STATUTES INVOLVED

The pertinent provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 (Title I of the Internal Security Act of [September 23,] 1950, c. 1024, 64 Stat. 987, 50 U. S. C. §§ 781 ff.), as amended, the Immigration and Nationality Act of June 27, 1952, c. 477, 66 Stat. 163, and the Communist Control Act of [August 24,] 1954, c. 886, 68 Stat. 775, are set forth in the Appendix to petitioner's brief (Br. 225–270).

STATEMENT

A. The proceedings before the Board.—On November 22, 1950, the Attorney General, pursuant to § 13 (a) of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, filed with the respondent Subversive Activities Control Board a petition (R. 143–159) for an order requiring the present petitioner, the Communist Party of the United States, to register with him as a Communist-action organization in the manner required by § 7 (a), (c), and (d) of the Act. The petition alleged that the Party was a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act (§ 3 (3)), and set forth numerous allegations of fact in support of the contention.

On February 14, 1951, petitioner filed "under protest" an answer denying generally that it was a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act (R. 160–161). The answer cited the fact that there was then pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia a suit to enjoin further proceedings before the Board (ibid.). Petitioner reserved the right to amend its answer in the event of an adjudication in the pending court proceeding that an answer was required (ibid.). On February 28, 1951, a statutory three-judge court, in the proceeding referred to, denied the injunctive relief prayed for. Communist Party of the United States v. McGrath, 96 F. Supp. 47.[3] On March 13, 1951, the [3] The court (Letts and Pine, D. JJ.) based its decision on the grounds that petitioner had not exhausted its administrative remedies and that "the public interest is paramount to any threatened loss or damage" to petitioner "pending final determination of the case" (96 F. Supp. at 47). Circuit Judge Bazelon, concurring in the result, based his position on his determination that the Act was not unconstitutional on its face and that no circumstances appeared to warrant the intervention of a court of equity at that stage (id. at 47–53).

District Court issued an order staying answer and hearings before the Board to and including March 27, 1951, pending appeal (R. 1 [1804–1805], fn. 1). On March 26, 1951, this Court denied a petition for an extension of this stay (ibid.; see 340 U. S. 950). The suit was thereafter abandoned by petitioner (ibid.).

On April 3, 1951, petitioner filed an amended answer to the Attorney General's petition (R. 161–187), in which, inter alia, it admitted that it was organized in 1919 and had been in existence continuously since that date (R. 162), but again denied being a Communist-action organization as alleged in the Attorney General's petition (ibid.).

On April 23, 1951, hearings for the purpose of taking evidence commenced before three members of the Board sitting as a hearing panel (R. 1[1805]). On October 20, 1951, one member of the panel, Charles M. LaFollette, became unavailable to the Board by virtue of the adjournment of Congress without taking action on his nomination (ibid.). The hearing proceeded before the remaining two members of the panel, Peter Campbell Brown and Dr. Kathryn McHale, who were present at and participated in the entire hearing (ibid.). On October 23, 1951, petitioner moved the Board for an order striking all evidence theretofore received and all proceedings theretofore held because of the failure of the Senate to confirm panel member LaFollette and because of alleged bias and prejudice of the panel against petitioner (R. 1–2[1805]). The motion was denied following oral argument (R. 2[1805]). Petitioner thereupon instituted proceedings in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia to enjoin continuation of the hearings (ibid.; Communist Party of the United States v. Peter Campbell Brown, et al., unreported, Civil No. 4648–51). That court, on February 15, 1952, granted the Board's motion to dismiss this suit (R. 2, fn. 2 [1805]).

The hearings ended on July 1, 1952. Briefs and proposed findings of fact were filed by each party on July 28, 1952, reply briefs were filed on August 6, 1952, and oral argument was held before the hearing panel on August 14, 1952. On October 20, 1952, the panel issued its recommended decision finding petitioner to be a Communist-action organization and recommending that the Board order it to register as such. On November 21, 1952, the Attorney General filed certain exceptions to the recommended decision, requesting that the Board adopt the panel's findings with some minor changes of text. On November 24, 1952, petitioner filed its exceptions to the recommended decision. Oral argument on the exceptions was held on January 7, 1953. (R. 2[1805–1806].)

directing petitioner to register in accordance with the finding that it was a Communist-action organization. The Report was unanimous. It was signed by three members of the Board (R. 132 [2042]). The fourth and only other then member of the Board[4] filed a short concurring opinion in which he stated that he was "fully in accord with and concur[red] in the findings and in the determination that [petitioner] is a Communist-action organization under subsection (3) of Section 3 of the Act and required to register as such under Section 7" (R. 133[2042–2043]).

"Upon the overwhelming weight of the evidence in this proceeding," the Report concluded, "we find that [petitioner] is substantially directed, dominated, and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement referred to in § 2 of the Act; and that [petitioner] operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement" (R. 132[2042]). Under § 3 (3) of the Act, this finding brought petitioner within the definition of a "Communist-action organization." The evidence on which the Board's finding was based is set forth in detail in the Report at R. 4–128 [1810–2034], the bracketed reference containing the Board's annotations, i. e., supporting references to the testimony and exhibits. See fn. 2, [4] While the Board is normally composed of five members, there was then a vacancy.

supra, p. 2. The Board's Report summarizes the evidence on both sides. Where issues of credibility are met on important points, the Board has recorded its position. Similarly, where there are conflicts in testimony on particular issues, the Board has resolved them. In addition, the opinion of the Court of Appeals contains a briefer but still comprehensive summary of the evidence (Op. 48–75, R. 2125–2152). There is therefore, we believe, no need to attempt to summarize in this brief the voluminous evidence supporting the Board's particular findings and ultimate finding. Reference to the findings of fact in the annotated Report (R. 1810–2034) will enable this Court, to the extent it feels it necessary to do so, to correlate the comprehensive factual data set forth therein with the record testimony and exhibits, without the necessity of reading an additional statement of the evidence. See also infra, pp. 209–261.

B. Proceedings before the court below.—On June 17, 1953, petitioner, pursuant to § 14 (a) of the Act, filed in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit a petition for review (R. 139–142) of the Board's order.

Following submission of the case on briefs and oral argument, petitioner, on August 11, 1954, filed in the Court of Appeals a motion for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board (R. 2053–2066; see infra pp. 277–279), and on August 20, 1954, a memorandum in opposition to this motion was filed (R. 2067–2076; see infra, pp. 279–282). The motion was denied without opinion in an order entered December 23, 1954 (R. 2077). See infra, pp. 277–285.

On September 13, 1954, the Court of Appeals set the case for re-argument, the order directing counsel to "address themselves primarily to (1) the validity of the Internal Security Act of 1950 if it be deemed to be not merely a registration statute, that is if it be considered an integrated whole, including the so-called sanction provisions and (2) the effect, if any, of the Communist Control Act of 1954 [which had been enacted on August 24, 1954, after the original submission of the case], upon the order here under review" (R. 2076–2077).

On December 23, 1954, following the submission of further briefs and oral argument, the order of the Board was affirmed, Judge Bazelon dissenting (R. 2167). The court, while modifying two of the Board's subsidiary findings of fact (Op. 72, 73–74, R. 2149, 2150–2151; see infra, pp. 257–261), held, after a painstaking review of the evidence (Op. 48–75, R. 2125–2152), that the "ultimate finding of the Board"—i. e., that petitioner "is substantially directed, dominated and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement referred to in Section 2 of the Act" and "operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement"—"is supported by the basic findings which in our opinion supported by a preponderance of the evidence, and that the ultimate finding is itself supported by a preponderance of the evidence" (Op. 75–76, R. 2152–2153). The court also held that the Communist Control Act of 1954, except insofar as it amended the Subversive Activities Control Act,[48] had no application to this proceeding (Op. 48, R. 2125). The dissenting judge, being of the view that the registration provisions of the Act were unconstitutional as violative of the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against compulsory self-incrimination (Op. 76–89, R. 2153–2166), did not consider any of petitioner's other contentions (Op. 89, R. 2166).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I

Consideration of the problems which led to the enactment of the Subversive Activities Control Act will tend to show the reasonableness of the Act, particularly as applied to petitioner, and thus to refute the contention that it arbitrarily invades basic constitutional liberties.

[48] The court's qualifying phrase—"[i]n respects other than those already discussed" (Op. 48, R. 2125)—refers to its footnote 48 at Op. 30, R. 2107, where it discusses the repeal of §§ 5 (c) and 6 (c) of the Subversive Activities Control Act by § 7 (c) of the Communist Control Act.

By 1939, Congress had before it a mass of evidence, collected over the previous nine years, pointing to the conclusion that the Communist International and the Communist Party of the United States were dedicated to the establishment of a proletarian dictatorship by force and violence in this country and throughout the world, and that the American Communist Party was completely controlled both as to policy and leadership by the Soviet Union through the Communist International. The weapons adopted by Congress to combat this evil included the Smith Act of 1940, punishing advocacy of or conspiracy to advocate the overthrow of this Government by force and violence (sustained as against eleven leaders of petitioner in Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494), the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938 (considered in Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236), and the 1940 Voorhis Act. The two latter Acts were aimed at the dissemination in this country of unidentified foreign propaganda, the remedy adopted being compulsory identification and disclosure.

For various reasons these Acts could not be effectively enforced against organizations, such as petitioner, which threw a "smoke screen" around their operations and obscured the sources and nature of their foreign control. For example, petitioner, at its 1940 national convention, adopted a resolution "dissolving" its affiliation with the Communist International "for the specific purpose of removing itself from the terms of the so-called Voorhis Act." In addition, the Voorhis Act provided no adequate administrative machinery to search out the true facts regarding control by foreign dictatorships and the real objectives of domestic organizations which were believed (with reason) to be subversive but which veiled their true ends behind a facade of respectability. The Act was addressed only to the formal, overt aspects of a particular group, and failed to reach the true but secret purposes which lay beneath the surface and which constituted a real threat to the security of the United States.

The post-World War II revelations of widespread espionage and infiltration of sensitive government agencies in Canada, England, and the United States by Soviet agents, recruited from the membership of the domestic Communist parties in those countries, showed more clearly the nature and dimensions of the danger. In addition, the evidence adduced at the trial and conviction in 1949 of the eleven leaders of the American Communist Party under the Smith Act, and the commencement of hostilities in Korea in June 1950, furnished Congress with further reason to believe, in September 1950, when the Act in issue was passed, that the dissolution of the Communist International in 1943 had been merely a subterfuge and that there remained in existence a world Communist movement which endangered the security of the United States.

II

The Subversive Activities Control Act is constitutional as applied to petitioner.

A. The hearing and registration provisions.—1. The First Amendment does not prohibit Congress from requiring registration of, and disclosure of information by, domestic organizations dominated by foreign agencies whose purpose it is to establish a Communist dictatorship in this country. The freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment are not absolute. Even direct limitations on those freedoms are permissible where clearly necessary to the effectuation by Congress of an end within its power to bring about. A fortiori, those freedoms may be indirectly restrained in proper circumstances.

This Court has many times sustained statutes which placed indirect restraints on freedom of speech or of the press, where the statute's objective lay within the power of Congress or a state to bring about, and the restraint was a necessary and appropriate concomitant of the exercise of the power. Examples are the Hatch Act (United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75), the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act (United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612), the Federal Corrupt Practices Act (Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, 290 U. S. 534), the non-

Communist affidavit clause of the amended National Labor Relations Act (American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382), the ownership-disclosure requirements of the postal laws (Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 229 U. S. 288), and a state statute regulating associations having oath-bound memberships (Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U. S. 63). The Foreign Agents Registration Act (see Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, particularly the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Black, with whom Mr. Justice Douglas concurred, 318 U. S. at 251) is another illustration of a statute of this type. It is settled, too, that newspaper companies and radio broadcasting stations are subject to regulation in the public interest, notwithstanding the indirect restraints on freedom of speech and of the press which flow from such regulation.

The various evils at which the statutes thus sustained were aimed, grave as they were, are dwarfed in comparison to the evil at which the Act at bar strikes—the threatened destruction, through force, violence, and deceit, of our constitutional form of government and the subjection of the nation to the domination and control of a foreign dictatorship. In the light of that evil, the registration requirements do not invalidly restrict free speech, press, or association. The rationale underlying this Court's decisions sustaining "disclosure" statutes is that it is in the interest of both free speech and free association that Congress and the public be adequately and correctly informed, at least where the dangers stemming from non-disclosure are serious. In the light of our knowledge of the world Communist movement and of the danger it presents to the nation, the device of registration and disclosure can properly be applied to the Communist Party, now that it has been found, after full hearing, to be directed and controlled by the Soviet Union and to be operating primarily to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement.

2. Neither the registration provisions of the Act nor the Board's order violates the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against compulsory self-incrimination.

(a) The privilege applies only to natural individuals, of whom there is none before the Court at this time. The present case is therefore not a proper vehicle for the litigation of self-incrimination issues.

(i) The privilege must be personally and explicitly claimed. There has been no claim of privilege thus far, and there may never be one. Since this Court does not anticipate constitutional issues, petitioner's attempt to litigate the self-incrimination issue in this case, before it is raised, is premature. The officers of petitioner who will have the duty to effect its registration when the registration order becomes final will be able to claim their privilege on the registration form required to be filed with the Attorney General. The question of the validity of the claim, if its validity is disputed, can then be litigated.

There are several reasons, moreover, why it cannot justifiably be assumed at this time that a substantial claim of privilege will inevitably be made and be required to be honored when petitioner is confronted by the statutory requirement that it register, after the order becomes final.

The top officials of petitioner, who are the ones who will have the duty of filing the registration statement, have never attempted to conceal their membership and places of leadership in petitioner. A claim of privilege on their part would be on a different footing from a similar claim by a person not publicly and indisputably known as a Communist Party member. The privilege presupposes a real danger of legal detriment arising from disclosure. Rogers v. United States, 340 U. S. 367. Relevant to the issue of the bona fides of a claim of privilege against self-incrimination would be the fact that under the Act neither the holding of office nor membership in a Communist organization shall constitute per se a violation of any criminal statute, and the further fact that the registration of any person under the Act as an officer or member may not be received in evidence against him in any prosecution for any alleged violation of any criminal statute. Moreover, two of the members of petitioner's National Committee voluntarily testified in this very case and admitted their high official positions; they may thereby have waived any privilege. Whatever the merits of these hypothetical questions, their determination should await their being maturely raised.

(ii) Even assuming, moreover, that a claim of privilege will be made and that when made it will be required to be honored, this would make the order to register at most unenforceable, not void. This non-enforceability would not affect the "sanctions" which come into effect when an order to register becomes final; and Congress could certainly remove the barrier to non-enforceability by a grant of immunity. Furthermore, an important public function is served by the Board's finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization and should register, regardless of whether the registration can actually be effected.

(b) If the Court should reject our argument that it need not and should not now pass upon the issue of whether an officer of petitioner can validly claim the privilege as a ground for not registering petitioner, and should desire to determine that issue in this proceeding, our position would be that the privilege is not available to such officers, under the rationale of United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694—that an officer of an organization who has custody of its records, if called upon to produce them pursuant to a subpoena, may not lawfully refuse even if they would tend to incriminate him personally. The rationale of this decision is not inapplicable on the ground that in that case physical records were in question, while the issue here is the compulsory submission of a registration statement containing the names and addresses of officers and members of petitioner and an accounting of moneys received and expended. The data required to be contained in the registration statement are reproductions of or extracts from organization records. If the officer can be compelled to produce the physical records, he can be compelled to transpose their pertinent data to a registration form. Any valid privilege as to personal information can be claimed on the registration form. Cf. United States v. Sullivan, 274 U. S. 259.

(c) The validity of the personal registration requirements of § 8 is not in issue since no individual member of petitioner has been required to register and none is before the Court.

3. The registration provisions are in accord with due process.

(a) The Act does not predetermine petitioner's liability to registration so as to render the proceedings before the Board a formality; nor does it contain any "built-in" finding against petitioner. Petitioner's contrary argument ignores the crucial language in the § 3 (3) definition of a "Communist-action" organization. Under that definition, a domestic organization which is not substantially controlled by the foreign government or group controlling the world Communist movement, or which does not operate primarily to advance the objectives of that movement, is not a Communist-action organization and is not subject to the registration and other provisions of the Act, regardless of how "communistic" its philosophy might be, or how deep might be its bonds of sympathy and kinship with the foreign government or organization. The important point is that Congress required proof, which it made subject to judicial review, of the two fundamental operative facts (referred to above) by a preponderance of the evidence in proceedings before the Board, before the obligation to register or any other requirement of the Act could become effective.

Due process does not require that the congressional findings in § 2 as to the existence of a world or an American Communist movement be the subject of redetermination before the Board. These are general legislative findings supporting the Act as a whole and not adjudicative facts forming the basis for an order against an individual organization. This Court has specifically recognized the general adequacy of these legislative findings. Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522; Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524.

(b) The Act does not establish a Board which is "necessarily biased" against petitioner. Petitioner's contention to the contrary in effect charges that the structure and scheme of the Act are such that it would be impossible to staff the Board with members who would not enter upon their duties with the intention of violating their oaths of office. But courts should not assume in advance that an administrative hearing may not be fairly conducted, particularly where, as here, full opportunity for judicial review is afforded by the Act. Fahey v. Mallonee, 332 U. S. 245.

(c) The Act does not authorize a determination that an organization is a Communist-action organization on the basis of irrational or vague criteria or presumptions. The Act establishes no tests or criteria of whether an organization is a Communist-action group other than the test established by the definition of such an organization in § 3 (3) (see supra, p. 21; infra, p. 69), which petitioner concedes to be "definite and meaningful." The eight factors itemized in § 13 (e) are merely evidentiary considerations which the Act directs the Board to take into account in determining whether an organization meets the § 3 (3) definition. When these factors are thus correctly understood they are all rational and probative with respect to the decisive issue presented by the definition. And the fact that Congress directed the Board to "take into consideration" "the extent to which" the § 13 (c) factors are true or applicable with respect to a given organization does not render vague the ultimate standard of § 3 (3). Cf. Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrator, 312 U. S. 126; Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U. S. 503.

(d) The Communist Control Act of 1954 does not make it impossible for petitioner to know who its members are. Section 5 of that Act does not establish "criteria" for determining membership in petitioner any more than § 13 (e) of the Act at bar establishes "criteria" for determining whether an organization is a Communist-action group. The purpose of § 5 is merely to list items of evidence to be considered in reaching the ultimate factual conclusion of knowing membership. Petitioner's attempt to depict § 5 as a trap for the unwary disregards the nature of the listed items as nonexclusive evidentiary factors and ignores the further provision of § 5 that the determination by "the jury" of the issue of knowing membership shall be "under instructions from the court". Moreover, the language of § 5 shows that it has no application to or connection with petitioner's duty under this Act to file a registration statement listing its members, or to possible criminal proceedings against it or its officers for wilfully omitting the names of any members in such a statement.

(e) The validity of the provision making each day of failure to register a separate offense is not presented in this proceeding, since the penalty may never be applied to petitioner. In any event, the provision is valid. There can be no "astronomical accumulation" of penalties unless an organization which has been finally ordered to register chooses to incur them by continued deliberate noncompliance with a Board order which has been judicially sustained. It is settled that the extent of the permissible punishment imposable under an otherwise valid statute is a matter of exclusive legislative discretion.

B. The sanction provisions.—Immediately upon the registration of an organization under the Act, or when an order of the Board requiring an organization to register becomes final (after judicial review), certain "sanctions", or legal disabilities, automatically occur.

1. Petitioner contends that the sanctions, considered individually and collectively together with the "public opprobrium" which results from a registration order, make the Act one of "outlawry" and, as such, restrict and suppress its freedom of peaceful political advocacy, in violation of the First Amendment. If the validity of these sanctions is now properly before the Court, our position is that they are reasonable and valid, considered in the light of the evil at which the Act strikes.

(a) Sanctions applicable to organizations as such.—(i) When an organization is registered or has been finally ordered to register, it must label its mailed literature and identify its broadcasts as emanating from a "Communist organization". Such labeling imposes no censorship on any mailed matter or broadcast material; the content of either is immaterial. What the provisions do is not to censor the "speech", but to identify the "speaker". If such revelation interferes with the purposes of an organization by destroying its anonymity and disclosing its true nature, it is because of the unpopularity of the organization in the free market of ideas.

The decisions of this Court teach that such disclosure and labeling requirements may be validly imposed in order to serve a proper purpose. (See supra, pp. 15–16). And what we have in this case is the Communist Party, foreign-controlled and engaged, among its other activities, in widespread propaganda on behalf of its ultimate objective of domination by the world Communist movement and the Soviet Union. Much of its propaganda is covert, and all of it attempts to sell itself to the public as peaceful and lawfully inspired. Theoretically, if everyone had the time and talent to be able to make an independent evaluation of the truth or soundness of each political utterance with which he is propagandized, he would have no need to know from what source the propaganda came. But as a practical matter this independent determination is in most cases impossible, and in making judgments we are continually influenced by the source from which statements emanate. And nowhere is the need for disclosure of the true source of propaganda more pressing than in the case of a Communist-action organization. In the light of the allegiance of American Communists to a foreign power and their ultimate goal, the extensive degree to which they use the technique of concealment, and the success that they have had in influencing public opinion by this technique, the requirement that the Communist Party identify its propaganda as emanating from a "Communist organization" is justified. Such identification does not limit freedom of expression, but adds to the relevant facts in the market-place of competing ideas.

Petitioner can have no valid objection to being required to identify itself as "The Communist Party, a Communist organization". An organization subject to the labeling requirements of this Act is one that has been found, after a full hearing (including judicial review), to be the puppet of a foreign power, working to achieve the ends of that power. It is not "just another political party". When an agency of the world Communist movement poses tactically as a benign domestic organization and champion of constitutional liberties, while concealing its ultimate strategy of foisting a communistic dictatorship on the nation in a Czechoslovakia-type coup—as soon as its leaders are in positions of sufficient power and the ranks of its lesser members have been sufficiently strengthened by the duped victims of its propaganda—Congress can act to defeat the strategy by compelling the truthful identification of the source of the propaganda.

(ii) The Act's disallowance of deductions for tax purposes of contributions to any organization which has been finally ordered to register as a Communist organization and its denial to such an organization of tax-exemption under the Internal Revenue Code are reasonable and valid withdrawals by Congress of its legislative grace for proper reasons of policy.

(iii) The Act makes it unlawful for officers and employees of the United States and of defense facilities to contribute funds or services to organizations which have been finally ordered to register. Assuming that the effect of this prohibition on petitioner is not so remote, despite the indirectness of its impact, as to deprive it of standing to challenge it, it is a reasonable and valid measure in relation to the evil at which the Act is aimed. If Congress can validly forbid employees of the United States to engage in partisan politics (United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75), and if the Government has the power to safeguard itself by appropriate security and loyalty investigations of its employees, Congress can validly forbid them to contribute to the welfare of an organization having as a primary objective the destruction of their employer at the earliest feasible opportunity and "by any available means, including force if necessary" (§ 2 (6)).

Similarly, if Congress can validly provide that members of a Communist-action organization shall be ineligible for defense-facility employment (see infra, p. 29), it can also forbid the employees of such facilities to support such an organization with money contributions.

(b) Sanctions applicable to individual members of organizations ordered to register.—(i) The members of an organization finally ordered to register are barred from government and defense-facility employment, and from holding office in or employment with any labor organization or as employer-representatives in proceedings under the National Labor Relations Act.

The reasonableness and validity of the prohibition against government employment is clear.

The prohibition applies only to those members who continue to remain such with knowledge or notice that the organization to which they belong either has voluntarily registered under the Act or has been finally ordered to do so. The prohibition against defense-facility employment is on a par with that relating to government employment. The manifest purpose of the prohibition is to guard against sabotage and espionage in establishments vital to the national defense. Congress is not limited, in guarding the nation against these dangers, to exacting criminal penalties after they occur. It can adopt reasonable measures to prevent their occurring. We must assume that the Secretary of Defense, under the power granted him by § 5 (b), will designate as "defense facilities" establishments that are vital to the national security. The Secretary's discretion is not "unfettered"; the rule of reason would apply here as elsewhere to supply a remedy if the authority were abused.

The prohibition against holding office in or employment by labor organizations is a logical corollary of American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, where the Court sustained the validity of the non-Communist affidavit provision of the amended National Labor Relations Act. If a union officer who cannot subscribe to a non-Communist affidavit can be forced out of his position of leadership in the union by the indirect method of depriving his union of rights it would otherwise enjoy before the Labor Board, there can be no infirmity in directly prohibiting him from being on a labor union staff as an officer or employee, so long as he retains his Communist ties. The prohibition against employer-representation is on the same footing, for management representatives, from their places on the other side of the bargaining table, can use their positions for political ends to the same (if not to a greater) extent than union officials.

(ii) Equally valid is the prohibition against the use of passports by members of organizations which have been finally ordered to register. The Government may decline to confer its diplomatic protection upon members of an organization found to be dedicated to its overthrow by force. The passport sanction is also valid insofar as it prevents travel abroad by members of such an organization. The unity and cohesive force of the world Communist movement are promoted through personal contacts of its members both here and abroad. Congress has the power to seek to prevent such contacts in the manner encompassed by this provision.

(iii) Alien members of Communist-action organizations which by a final order have been directed to register are excludable and deportable from the United States, and are ineligible for naturalized citizenship. Petitioner expressly concedes the validity of the exclusion and deportation sanctions. And there can be no doubt of the constitutionality of the naturalization sanction in view of the plenary power of Congress to impose conditions upon the conferring of citizenship by naturalization. The Act also provides that membership (within five years after naturalization) in a Communist-action organization shall, with respect to persons who obtain naturalization in the future, constitute a rebuttable presumption in denaturalization proceedings of lack of attachment to the principles of the Constitution at the time of naturalization. Since there is no question of retroactivity, or of the Government's revoking a grant of citizenship on grounds which the naturalized person could have had no reason to anticipate when he received it, this provision is likewise valid.

2. The member-sanctions do not deprive petitioner's members of due process, in that they do not rest on innocent and unknowing memberships and associations of the past. They apply only to members who continue their membership after an organization registers or is finally ordered to register. Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183, is therefore inapplicable. Nor is there merit in petitioner's contention that, after an organization has registered as a Communist-action group, thereby admitting its character as defined in § 3 (3), or after it has been formally found to be such an organization by a Board finding which has been judicially reviewed and sustained, each member must be afforded an opportunity personally to rebut the characterization, before any member-sanction can apply to him on account of his continued membership.

3. The sanction provisions do not make of the Act a bill of attainder. For a legislative act to constitute a bill of attainder, it is necessary that there be punishment and that the conduct punished be past conduct. American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382. The latter characteristic, regardless of whether the sanctions be deemed of a penal nature or not, is not present in the Act at bar. The "members" on whom the sanctions are imposed are not past or former members of the organization, but current members. Bona fide termination of membership by any person who is a member up to the time of registration or the time when an order to register becomes final precludes the sanctions' taking effect as to him.

III

The court below correctly sustained the Board's factual findings that petitioner is a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act.

A. There is no occasion for a second judicial review of the Board's factual finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization. A unanimous Board found, on the basis of the "overwhelming weight of the evidence", that petitioner is a Communist-action organization. It presented the grounds of this finding, and the subsidiary findings on which it rests, in an exhaustive report covering 133 printed pages. The court below, in discharge of its statutory obligation, after a painstaking review of the entire record, determined that the Board's finding was "supported by the preponderance of the evidence", and devoted more than a third of its 76-page opinion to a discussion and analysis of the evidence on both sides. In these circumstances, there is no occasion for this Court to subject the lengthy transcript to a second judicial review for the purpose of reappraising and re-evaluating the evidence. It need do no more than satisfy itself that the court below made a fair assessment of the record on the issue of sufficiency of the evidence. National Labor Relations Board v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 340 U. S. 498; National Labor Relations Board v. American Insurance Co., 343 U. S. 395. That the court below did so is evident from its opinion.

B. Petitioner makes no attempt to assay the significance of any of the proof it attacks from the standpoint of the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole. Its attack is concentrated on minutiae of the evidence, frequently lifted out of context. This fragmentary approach overlooks the fact that all relevant facts are cumulative in delineating a completed whole, and that an unmistakable picture can emerge from numerous fragments having little individual significance. Viewed from the standpoint of the record as a whole, petitioner's criticisms are but pin pricks at the evidence, often relating to matters having obviously minor bearing on the ultimate issue.

1. The Board and the court below correctly construed and applied the evidentiary considerations enumerated in § 13 (e) of the Act. The Board's finding, inter alia, that Marxism-Leninism, as understood, used, and followed by petitioner, consists of a body of doctrine, policies, strategies, and tactics intended to bring about the end of capitalism and to substitute for it a dictatorship of the proletariat, and that it has been promulgated and issued by the Soviet Union as "the overall philosophy, authoritative rules, directives and instructions governing the world Communist movement", fully met the requirements of the "directives and policies" factor.

As for the "non-deviation" factor, the point is not that petitioner's views on every issue were hostile to the interests of the United States. The point is rather that the fact that a domestic organization, throughout its 30 years' history, has faithfully and without deviation mirrored the views of a foreign power on every significant aspect of world politics is surely evidence, to be weighed in the balance with all the other evidence, that the foreign power controls the domestic organization and dictates its policies.

The contention that the Board and the court below misconstrued and misapplied the "discipline" factor of § 13 (e) (6) is in reality nothing more than an attack on the sufficiency of the evidence supporting the Board's finding on this point. It illustrates petitioner's mistaken insistence, met with throughout its discussion of the evidence, that the evidence under each of the § 13 (e) categories be considered in vacuo, unconnected with and unilluminated by any of the other evidence of record.

The argument that the Board misapplied the "allegiance" factor of § 13 (e) (8) is based on petitioner's mistaken assumption that the Board's finding that petitioner advocates the violent overthrow of the United States Government was based primarily on the Marxist-Leninist writings considered by this Court in Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118. The Board's force-and-violence finding was based upon the testimony of former members of petitioner, as well as upon authoritative writings not in evidence in the Schneiderman case.

2. The Board's finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization is based upon proof as to its current practices and activities as illuminated by its past history. The Board did not, as petitioner contends, rest its decision upon any "vague presumption of continuance". Petitioner's own witnesses testified that petitioner was the same sort of organization at the time of their testifying as it had always been. Petitioner's whole position in this case has been that it has never been—or at least that it has not been since 1940—an organization of the type the Act defines. The Government's evidence overwhelmingly established the contrary—that petitioner was and is such an organization.

3. The Board's conclusion that there exists a world Communist movement having the characteristics described in § 2 of the Act, while not essential to the validity of its order, was in any event supported by the preponderance of the evidence, as the court below found.

C. Petitioner's intemperate attack on the Attorney General's witnesses as "discredited" and its charge that the Board's findings are based on "misrepresentation of the evidence" are insubstantial and are based in many instances on distortions of the record. The use of informers as witnesses involves issues, not of law, but of credibility, the resolution of which is for the triers of the facts. The record shows that all of the Attorney General's witnesses were subjected to extensive cross-examination on matters going both to the substance of their testimony and to issues of credibility, and the Report of the Board makes it clear that it carefully weighed petitioner's attacks on the character of certain of the witnesses.

D. The action of the court below in modifying two of the subsidiary findings of the Board did not require that it remand the case to the Board for redetermination. The court found that the Board's ultimate and decisive finding—that petitioner is a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act—was supported by the preponderance of the evidence. Under the circumstances, remand would have served no useful purpose. It therefore correctly affirmed the Board's order. National Labor Relations Board v. Newport News Co., 308 U. S. 241.

IV

Petitioner was not denied a fair hearing before the Board.

A. There is no evidence that the Board, whose members served originally under recess appointments, was subjected to "extra-legal pressures" on the part of the Senate Judiciary Committee or its chairman. Petitioner's argument that "for many months during the pendency of the administrative proceeding, the tenure of the Board members was subject to the pleasure of the Senate Judiciary Committee" is in essence an indictment of all recess appointments as such. Petitioner's buttressing argument, that influence was in fact exerted on the Board members, finds no support in the record, but rests on pure speculation stemming from the fact that certain of the Attorney General's witnesses discussed the conduct of Board members in conversations with an old friend of theirs, a former member of the Communist Party, who was an employee of a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

B. Petitioner's motions to disqualify panel members McHale and Brown for alleged personal bias and prejudice were properly denied.

1. The comments of panel member McHale in the speech which she made during the progress of the hearings, viewed in their context, did not indicate a belief on her part, as petitioner contends, that the hearings were a mere formality.

2. The remarks of panel member Brown which petitioner claims showed bias on his part were made after he and Dr. McHale had made their findings and recommendations in the case. Mr. Brown's public repetition of what he had already made a matter of record—that on the evidence he had heard he believed petitioner to be a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act—showed no bias on his part.

V

A motion to the Court of Appeals under § 14 (a) for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board is addressed to the sound judicial discretion of the court. Cf. National Labor Relations Board v. Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 318 U. S. 9. In this case an analysis of the evidence, particularly as shown in the Board's memorandum in opposition to petitioner's motion, indicates that, even if the testimony of the three government witnesses in question were completely ignored, there would have been no reasonable possibility that the Board's ultimate and decisive finding—that petitioner is a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act—would have been different.

VI

A. The recess appointments of Board members Brown, McHale, and Coddaire during the adjournment of the Second Session of the 81st Congress from September 23 to November 27, 1950, were valid.

1. The appointments filled "vacancies" on the Board even though the offices filled were newly-created positions which had had no prior occupants. The argument that the only vacancies which may be filled by recess appointments are vacancies arising from the death, resignation, or removal of prior occupants would frustrate to an important degree the very purpose of the recess appointment clause, which is to enable the business of government to be carried on through temporary appointments during periods when the Senate is not available to act on nominations to office. This has been the prevailing understanding.

2. The fact that the vacancies arose simultaneously with the passage of the Act on September 23, 1950, while the Senate was still in session, did not preclude their being filled by recess appointments during the recess, or period of adjournment, which commenced later on that same day. The true meaning of the recess appointment clause—the one which alone comports with its evident sense and spirit, and which has the support of executive interpretations commencing at an early date in the nation's history, in addition to sound judicial support—is that the President may make recess appointments to fill vacancies which happen to exist during a Senatorial recess even though they may have come into existence while the Senate was in session.

3. The appointments were made during "the recess" of the Senate. Intrasessional adjournments to a day certain, if of substantial duration, as well as sine die adjournments between sessions, are recesses within the meaning of the constitutional clause. The decisive consideration is whether the Senate in a practical sense is unavailable to receive nominations to office, so as to necessitate the granting of temporary commissions to fill vacancies in order that the business of government may be carried on. The Senate was absent and unavailable in this practical sense during the period of adjournment from September 23 to November 27, 1950.

B. The recess appointments did not expire on January 2, 1951, with the expiration of the Second Session of the 81st Congress, thereby leaving a seven-month hiatus in the tenure of the Board members, i. e., between that date and August 9, 1951, when the members' regularly submitted nominations were duly confirmed. Under the terms of the recess appointment clause, recess appointments expire at "the end" of the "next session" of the Senate following "the recess" in which they were made. In this case, the "next session" was the First Session of the 82d Congress, which began on January 3, 1951, and did not end until October 20, 1951. Senate confirmation of the members' nominations on August 9, 1951, thus occurred during that session, while the recess appointments were still in effect. There was consequently no gap in the members' tenure. Petitioner's contention that the recess appointments expired on January 2, 1951, with the close of the Second Session of the 81st Congress, involves the untenable assumption that the adjournment of Congress from September 23 to November 27, 1950, split that "Session" into two "sessions." That such adjournments to a day certain do not have this effect is clear from Article I, § 5, clause 4 of the Constitution, which provides that "Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days * * *" [emphasis added].

ARGUMENT

Petitioner and the amici curiae level a broad-scale attack against almost every provision and facet of the Subversive Activities Control Act, as if the Court were called upon in this one ruling to pass upon the whole Act and its entire application. But the truth is, of course, that the Act is multi-faceted and only some of its aspects are now ripe for adjudication. Three types of organizations —"Communist-action", "Communist-front", and "Communist-infiltrated"—are dealt with in the Act. As to these organizations, there are three general classes of provisions—hearing and registration requirements, non-criminal sanctions, and criminal penalties; there are also comparable classes of provisions as to certain categories of individuals. In this case at this time, we have only one organization and only one of the three types—the Communist Party of the United States, found to be a Communist-action organization; no other class of organization and no individuals at all are before the Court. Moreover, we are dealing with the Communist Party only at the stage when it is availing itself of its statutory right to contest in the courts the Board's finding that it is a Communist-action organization and the Board's order that it register as such.

These facts mold the frame in which the Court will view the case and in which we must present it. But before focussing directly on the various levels of controversy, we think that it will be helpful to sketch the historical background of the Act, and also to give a somewhat detailed analysis of the Act's provisions (although only part of these provisions are directly pertinent to this case).

INTRODUCTION: THE BACKGROUND AND PROVISIONS OF THE SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL ACT

A. THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF THE ACT

We give a brief review of the Act's historical setting in the hope that it will assist the Court in its task of weighing the merits of petitioner's arguments. Just as an examination of the problem or evil which evoked the passage of legislation is a sound guide to its purpose and meaning (Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 143 U. S. 457, 463; Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U. S. 469, 489–493), so too a fair appreciation of the nature of the problem which led to the enactment of a statute is indispensable to proper evaluation of the soundness of challenges to its constitutionality. Cf. American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 388–389; Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 562–566 (Mr. Justice Jackson, concurring). Consideration of the problems which called the legislation here involved into being will tend to show, we believe, the reasonableness of the basic scheme of the Act, particularly as applied to the petitioner, and thus to refute the contention that it arbitrarily invades basic constitutional liberties. Rarely has there been a more intense study of methods of dealing with a particular evil than that which preceded and produced the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950.[5]

Following World War I, there developed the powerful totalitarian political movements of Communism, National Socialism, and Fascism in Russia, Germany, and Italy. The success of the so-called Fifth-Column groups in Europe during the 1930's indicated the vulnerablity of republican forms of government to conspiracies guided from outside the country involved, ready to seize total power by illegal means as soon as the time became propitious. See Loewenstein, Legislative Control of Political Extremism in European Democracies (1938), 38 Col. L. Rev. 591–622, 725–774. By 1940 it was clear that these highly organized and disciplined totalitarian movements, financed and directed from abroad and promoted domestically by secret dedicated action-groups, involved much greater danger to the democracies than had earlier individual exponents of political violence. The danger became one, not of ideas and philosophies, but of external aggression aided by local Trojan-Horse groups serving the aggressive aims of their foreign principals.

As early as 1930, investigations were conducted by Congressional committees into Communist propaganda and activities in the United States and considerable testimony directed to this issue was adduced in various cities of the United States. See Internal Security Manual, Sen. Doc. No. 47, 83d Cong., 1st sess. (1953), pp. 216–217. In 1934, the investigation was extended to Nazi propaganda activities. Id., pp. 217–218. During the years 1930–1940, it was shown that the alien political philosophies of the right and left had created divided loyalties in this country. For example, William Z. Foster, the leader of the Communist Party of the United States, testified in 1931 that the "more advanced workers" in this country "look upon the Soviet Union as their country" (Hearings before a Special Committee to Investigate Communist Activities in the United States, H. R., 71st Cong., 2d sess., Part I, vol. 4, p. 384).

Also significant were the 1939 hearings before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, in which the testimony of such witnesses as Benjamin Gitlow and Earl Browder, as well as a mass of documentary evidence, tended to show the subservience of the American Communist Party to the Soviet Union (Hearings before a Special Committee on Un-American Activities, H. R., 76th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 7, passim). Congress had before it the Theses, Statutes, and Conditions of Admission to the Third (Communist) International, adopted at the Second World Congress of the Communist International, in 1920 (id., vol. 7, pp. 4668–4671).[6] Among the "conditions" which a party aspiring to join the International was required to accept were: Willingness to combine illegal with legal work to advance the objective of a world proletarian dictatorship (condition 3); willingness to infiltrate and carry on propaganda and agitation in military organizations (condition 4); renunciation of "social patriotism," and systematic demonstration to the working class of the necessity of a "revolutionary overthrow of capitalism" (condition 6); recognition of the necessity of "complete and absolute rupture with reformism and the policy of the 'centrists'" (condition 7); willingness to carry on "systematic and persistent Communist work in the labor unions" and to form "Communist nuclei" within unions to the end that they should be "'[won] over * * * to Communism'" (condition 9); willingness to "re-

[6] These Theses, Statutes, and Conditions of Admission were in evidence in the present proceeding (A. G. Ex. No. 8, R. 1318–1332). They are also set forth in Blueprint for World Conquest as Outlined by the Communist International (Human Events, 1946), pp. 33–72.

move all unreliable elements" from "the personnel of their parliamentary factions" and to ensure the subjection of such personnel to the "Central Committee of the party" (condition 11); the maintenance of "iron discipline" on the basis of the "principle of democratic centralization" to the end that the "party centre" may enjoy "the confidence of the party membership" and be "endowed with complete power" over it (condition 12); willingness to "render every possible assistance to the Soviet Republics in their struggle against all counter-revolutionary forces" and to carry on "propaganda to induce the workers to refuse to transport any kind of military equipment intended for fighting against the Soviet Republics" (condition 14); recognition of the "binding" force of all resolutions of congresses of the Communist International and of its Executive Committee on "all parties joining the Communist International" (condition 16); and exclusion from the party of all members who "reject in principle the conditions and theses" (condition 21).[7]

Congress was informed that these "conditions" governed the relationship between the American Communist Party and the International (Hearings, etc., supra, vol. 7, pp. 4308–4311, 4667–4668).

[7] Blueprint for World Conquest as Outlined by the Communist International (Human Events, 1946), pp. 66–72; Hearings, etc., supra, vol. 7, pp. 4669–4671.

For example, in 1929, the Executive Committee of the International, under the personal leadership of Stalin and Molotov, decided upon and enforced the replacement of the Lovestone-Gitlow leadership of the American Party with that of Foster and Browder. When Lovestone and Gitlow defied the Executive Committee, Stalin made a speech reminding them of the fate of Trotsky and Zinoviev (id., p. 4432),[8] and the Party's organ, the Daily Worker, stated editorially on June 1, 1929, that (id., p. 4671)—

> * * * Comrades Lovestone and Gitlow in their declaration of May 14 refused to accept the address or to carry it out, and even went to the length of stating that they would actively oppose it. They are thus entering upon a course leading toward an attempt to split the party, a course in violation of the 21 conditions and the statutes of the Comintern. * * * [Emphasis added.]

Thus, by 1939, there was a mass of oral and documentary evidence collected by the House Committee on Un-American Activities over the previous nine years (see Internal Security Manual, Sen. Doc. No. 47, 83d Cong., 1st sess., pp. 216–219), from which it could be concluded that both the Communist International and the Communist Party of the United States were devoted to the establishment of a proletarian dictatorship by force and violence, and that the American Communist Party was completely controlled both as to policy and leadership by the Soviet Union through the Communist International. See also H. Rep. No. 153, 74th Cong., 1st sess. (1935), p. 21.

Congress first endeavored to deal with this problem in several ways. In the portion of the Alien Registration Act of 1940, c. 439, 54 Stat. 670, known as the Smith Act—i. e., §§ 2, 3, and 5 (now consolidated in 18 U. S. C. § 2385)—it was made a criminal offense to advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence or to conspire so to advocate.[8a] The problem of the dissemination of foreign propaganda was approached by the method of disclosure. In 1938, Congress enacted the Foreign Agents Regis-

[8a] The constitutionality of this provision, as applied to a conspiracy charge against eleven national officers of petitioner for the period from April 1, 1945, to July 20, 1948, was upheld in Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494. See also Frankfeld v. United States, 198 F. 2d 679 (C. A. 4), certiorari denied, 344 U. tration Act, c. 327, 52 Stat. 631, 22 U. S. C. §§ 611–621, requiring the registration of any individual or organization acting as the domestic agent of a foreign principal and requiring information as to the identity of the principal and the terms of the contract. The committee reports on the bill which became that Act both stated as follows (H. Rep. No. 1381, 75th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 1–2; S. Rep. No. 1783, 75th Cong., 3d sess., pp. 1–2):

> Incontrovertible evidence has been submitted to prove that there are many persons in the United States representing foreign governments or foreign political groups, who are supplied by such foreign agencies with funds and other materials to foster un-American activities, and to influence the external and internal policies of this country, thereby violating both the letter and the spirit of international law, as well as the democratic basis of our own American institutions of government.
>
> This required registration will publicize the nature of subversive or other similar activities of such foreign propagandists, so that the American people may know those who are engaged in this country by foreign agencies to spread doctrines alien to our democratic form of government, or propaganda for the purpose of influencing

American public opinion on a political question.

We believe that the spotlight of pitiless publicity will serve as a deterrent to the spread of pernicious propaganda. We feel that our people are entitled to know the sources of any such efforts, and the person or persons or agencies carrying on such work in the United States.

Various difficulties in the enforcement of the Foreign Agents Registration Act (see Report of the Institute of Living Law, 87 Cong. Rec., Appendix, pp. A4417–4419 (1941); Institute of Living Law, Combating Totalitarian Propaganda: The Method of Exposure (1943), 10 Univ. of Chi. L. Rev. 107) resulted in its amendment by the Act of April 29, 1942, c. 263, 56 Stat. 258, which strengthened the provisions and transferred the administration of the Act to the Attorney General. The Reports of the Attorney General to Congress on the Administration of the Foreign Agents Registration Act detail the operation of that statute.

The purpose of Congress to expose the foreign origin of various propaganda activities was, however, not fully achieved, partly because of an increased tendency to bring information services under the aegis of diplomatic immunity (see Report of the Attorney General on the Administration of the Foreign Agents Registration Act, 1945–1949, p. 8; 1950 Report, pp. 5–6; 1951 Report, pp. 6–7), and partly because of controversy as to the scope of the "agency" required under the statute. See Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, 242; United States v. German American Vocational League, 153 F. 2d 860, 864 (C. A. 3), certiorari denied, 328 U. S. 833; United States v. Peace Information Center, 97 F. Supp. 255, 258–259 (D. D. C.). The necessity of proving the fact of agency within the context of a criminal trial made difficult the enforcement of the Act against organizations which threw a "smoke screen" around their operations and obscured the sources and nature of their foreign control.

On October 17, 1940, Congress passed the so-called Voorhis Act, c. 897, 54 Stat. 1201 (now 18 U. S. C. § 2386), requiring the registration, inter alia, of any organization "subject to foreign control which engages in political activity." The phrase "subject to foreign control" was defined in § 1 of the Act as follows:

> (e) An organization shall be deemed "subject to foreign control" if (1) it solicits or accepts financial contributions, loans, or support of any kind, directly or indirectly, from, or is affiliated directly or indirectly with, a foreign government or a political subdivision thereof, or an agent, agency, or instrumentality of a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, or a political party in a foreign country, or an international political organization, or (2) its policies, or any of them, are determined by or at the suggestion of, or in collaboration with, a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, or an agent, agency, or instrumentality of a foreign government or a political subdivision thereof, or a political party in a foreign country, or an international political organization.

The House Committee on the Judiciary, in its report on the bill which became the Voorhis Act, said with respect to the purposes of the bill (H. Rep. No. 2582, 76th Cong., 3d sess., p. 1):

> Freedom of political expression is a fundamental principle of democracy. A serious problem arises, however, where political organizations exist in a democracy which are substantially controlled or directed by a foreign power and seek to pursue a policy in a democracy like the United States for the benefit of that foreign power.
>
> The principle upon which this bill is based is that there is no place in a democracy for undercover political organizations. Without in any way interfering with freedom of political activity, the passage of this legislation would mean that it would be unlawful for any political activities, inimical to the constitutional government, to be carried on, unless the full facts concerning such activities are made known.

It soon became apparent that there were also difficulties in the enforcement of the Voorhis Act. See Institute of Living Law, Combating Totalitarian Propaganda: The Method of Exposure (1943), 10 Univ. of Chi. L. Rev. 107, 122–133. Since religious, charitable, scientific, literary, and educational organizations were excluded from the Act's coverage, propaganda organizations could seek to avoid registration by styling themselves under one of the excluded categories. There was no express provision making the officers guilty if a corporation or association failed to register. In the case of a corporation or unincorporated association without funds for the payment of fines, there were no appropriate sanctions to enforce compliance. While it was originally anticipated that both the Communist Party and the German-American Bund would have to register under the Act (H. Rep. No. 2582, 76th Cong., 3d sess., p. 2), the restricted meanings given to the terms "subject to foreign control" and "political activity" by the Act itself made avoidance of registration possible through the device of a claimed divorcement. For example, the Communist Party, at its 1940 convention, adopted a resolution which provided, inter alia (C. P. Ex. 13, p. 15):

> That the Communist Party of the U. S. A., in Convention assembled, does hereby cancel and dissolve its organiza> tional affiliation to the Communist International, as well as any and all other bodies of any kind outside the boundaries of the United States of America, for the specific purpose of removing itself from the terms of the so-called Voorhis Act, which originated in the House of Representatives as H. R. 10094, which has been enacted and goes into effect in January 1941, which law would otherwise tend to destroy, and would destroy, the position of the Communist Party as a legal and open political party of the American working class * * *.

This disaffiliation and its stated purpose are not disputed by petitioner (Br. 202). Its spurious character was demonstrated by the testimony in this case. See Report of the Board at R. 14 [1828–1829].

In addition, the Voorhis Act provided no adequate administrative machinery to search out the true facts regarding control by foreign dictatorships and the real objectives of domestic organizations believed (with reason) to be subversive but which veiled their true ends behind a facade of respectability. That Act was addressed only to the formal, overt aspects of a particular group, and failed to reach the true but secret purposes which lay beneath the surface and which constituted a real threat to the security of the United States. After the cessation of hostilities in World War II, events occurred and facts were uncovered which tended to show more clearly the nature and dimensions of the danger. Communist regimes were established in several countries other than the Soviet Union, and elsewhere communist parties attained considerable strength. The methods by which these regimes seized power—for example, in Czechoslovakia—were not unknown or unnoted in this country.[9] Moreover, there came to light direct evidence of espionage. The revelations of Igor Gouzenko, a clerk on the staff of Colonel Zabotin, Soviet Military Attaché in Canada, led to the establishment of a Royal Commission in Canada to investigate espionage activities being conducted through that office. After hearing the testimony of many witnesses and considering a mass of documentary materials, the Commission concluded in a thorough report that the Soviet Union, acting through Canadian Communists, was attempting to infiltrate every sensitive agency of the Canadian government and its defense establishments and had to a great extent succeeded. Report of the Royal Commission to Investigate the Facts Relating to and the Circumstances Surrounding the Communication by Public Officials and Other Persons in Positions of Trust of Secret and Confidential Information to Agents of a Foreign Power (1946). The Report revealed that local agents, trained in Fifth-Column methods, passed information to Soviet officers within the Embassy, who were frequently members of the N. K. V. D. (Soviet secret police) in direct communication with Moscow (id., pp. 11–13). It was found from documents emanating from the Soviet Embassy that the Communist International, or Comintern, the dissolution of which had been announced in Moscow in 1943, continued to exist and to be active in espionage work on this continent (id., pp. 37–41). The Report quoted a statement by Gouzenko that (id., p. 37)—

> The announcement of the dissolution of the Comintern was probably the greatest farce of the Communists in recent years. Only the name was liquidated, with the object of reassuring public opinion in the democratic countries. Actually the Comintern exists and continues its work * * *.

"The documents which Gouzenko brought with him," the Royal Commission commented, "corroborate this testimony" (ibid.).

The Commission found that the main recruiting ground for espionage agents was the illegally constituted Communist Party of Canada. The Communist cells, which posed as study groups, were the contact points for the agents (id., pp. 44–48, 69–83). Often a particular Communist agent would be selected for Colonel Zabotin's group on orders directly from Moscow (id., pp. 44–48). It was shown by documentary evidence that the national organizer for the Communist Party of Canada was instructed in 1945 to recruit espionage agents in the defense establishments of the Canadian government (id., pp. 48–49, 97). Money to pay for espionage services was paid to some of the Canadian agents by the Soviet Embassy (id., pp. 59–68).[10]

In England, the scientist Klaus Fuchs, a Communist, confessed to espionage of the gravest character against the United Kingdom and the Investigations in the United States by Congressional agencies led to similar conclusions. See The Shameful Years: Thirty Years of Soviet Espionage in the United States, H. Rep. No. 1229, 82d Cong., 2d sess. It was found that the Soviet Union established organizations in the United States ostensibly for commercial purposes, but actually to act as a funnel for intelligence work (id., pp. 5–7, 15). Testimony by former Communist agents showed that Communist espionage groups had successfully infiltrated certain strategic areas of the Government and maintained liaison with Soviet Embassy officials. Later, after the passage of the Subversive Activities Control Act, atomic and radar information was proved to have been passed to the Soviet Union by an international group. In 1949, after a protracted trial, Eugene Dennis and ten other leaders of the Communist Party were found guilty of violating the Smith Act, and the evidence produced at the trial furnished further proof of the attitudes and actions of the Party's top ranks, and their relationship to the Soviet Union. The convictions were affirmed, with an exhaustive opinion by Judge Learned Hand, on August 1, 1950, 183 F. 2d 201 (C. A. 2), slightly less than two months before the final enactment of the Act involved here. This Court later affirmed the Second Circuit, Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (without finding it necessary to review the sufficiency of the evidence).

Armed warfare began in Korea in June 1950.

Thu., Congress had reason to believe, in September 1950, that the dissolution of the Communist International in 1943 had been merely a subterfuge and that there remained in existence a world Communist movement which endangered the security of the United States.[12] This was the problem with which Congress undertook to deal in the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950.

B. THE IMMEDIATE EVOLUTION OF THE ACT

The Subversive Activities Control Act was the final distillate, after more than two years of study, of a number of different bills. Efforts were made to remove objectionable features from early drafts and to define with precision the terms employed without leaving the remedial legislation vulnerable to the kind of calculated avoidance that had been the prime weakness of previous registration statutes.

The so-called "Mundt-Nixon" bill (H. R. 5852, 80th Cong., 2d sess.) was introduced in the House and referred to the Committee on Un-American Activities on March 15, 1948 (94 Cong. Rec. 2893). As amended and reported out, § 8 of the bill provided for registration with the Attorney General by "Communist political organizations" and "Communist-front organizations." The Attorney General was authorized under § 13, either on his own initiative or at the request of either House of Congress, to make an investigation and conduct hearings to ascertain whether an organization was required to register.

In its report on the bill, the Committee on Un-American Activities cited the fact that the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938 and the Voorhis Act of 1940, while "directed against both Nazis and Communists," had "proved ineffective against the latter, due in part to the skill and deceit which the Communists have used in concealing their foreign ties" (H. Rep. No. 1844, 80th Cong., 2d sess., p. 5). It was also stated that, while the Alien Registration Act of 1940—i. e., the Smith Act—made it a crime to advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence, and "[w]hile force and violence is without doubt a basic principle to which all Communist Party members subscribe, the present line of the Party, in order to evade existing legislation, is to avoid wherever possible the open advocacy of force and violence" (ibid.). The report also indicated that ten years' investigation by the Committee had established (id., p. 2)—

> (1) That the Communist movement in the United States is foreign-controlled; (2) that its ultimate objective with respect to the United States is to overthrow our > free American institutions in favor of a Communist totalitarian dictatorship to be controlled from abroad; (3) that its activities are carried on by secret and conspiratorial methods; and (4) that its activities, both because of the alarming march of Communist forces abroad and because of the scope and nature of Communist activities here in the United States, constitute an immediate and powerful threat to the security of the United States and to the American way of life.

The Senate Judiciary Committee, to which the House bill was referred, sought the advice of several prominent lawyers and the then Attorney General as to the constitutionality of the bill (see 94 Cong. Rec. 9028). The legal memoranda received in response to this request are set out at pp. 415–428 of Hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, Senate, 80th Cong., 2d sess., on H. R. 5852; see also id., pp. 428–488.[13] The principal objection of those who thought the bill had constitutional defects was that the bill used such terms as "Communist political organization" and "Communist-front organization" without adequately defining those terms, and furnished the Attorney General with no precise legislative guide in determining whether an organization was required to register.

A new version of the bill was prepared (see 94 Cong. Rec. 9028, 9029–9032). It more precisely defined in its § 3 the terms "Communist political organization" and "Communist-front organization," and set forth in § 7 the duty of such organizations to register with the Attorney General and to file annual reports. In place of the provision for an administrative determination by the Attorney General, the revamped bill (§§ 12, 13) provided for a Subversive Activities Board, similar to that finally established in the Act, which was to make the determination as to whether a given organization was required to register, with further provision for judicial review of its determinations.

The redrafted bill—known as the "Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston" bill—was introduced in the First Session of the 81st Congress as S. 2311.[14] The opinions of various prominent attorneys were again solicited and the consensus appeared to be that in respects here relevant the bill met the constitutional objections theretofore raised and at the same time avoided the weaknesses of prior legislation (S. Rep. No. 1358, 81st Cong., 2d sess., pp. 7, 16–17).

The Internal Security Act, of which the Subversive Activities Control Act is a constituent part (Title I), was passed on September 23, 1950, over the President's veto. Both the House and Senate committee reports reemphasized the pressing need for bringing Communist organizations out in the open through the medium of registration requirements (H. Rep. No. 2980, 81st Cong., 2d sess., on H. R. 9490; S. Rep. No. 2369, 81st Cong., 2d sess., on S. 4037; S. Rep. No. 1358, 81st Cong., 2d sess., on S. 2311). The House committee report reiterated the fact that prior legislation directed to this end had been ineffectual against the Communist Party itself, and cited the fact that 30 of the 70 major countries of the world had outlawed the Communist Party (H. Rep. No. 2980, 81st Cong., 2d sess., p. 2). The report further noted that the committee had rejected proposals to outlaw the Communist Party or to make membership therein illegal per se, and emphasized that the "Communist organization of the United States" was not made guilty of any offense by reason of the enactment of the Act (id., p. 5).

C. THE STRUCTURE AND PROVISIONS OF THE ACT

The Subversive Activities Control Act is Title I of the Internal Security Act of 1950, c. 1024, 64 Stat. 987, 50 U. S. C. §§ 781*ff*. It has been twice [15] amended—once, in a relatively minor detail (see infra, p. 71), by the Act of July 29, 1954, c. 646, 68 Stat. 586, and again, in a more substantial manner, by the Communist Control Act of [August 24] 1954, c. 886, §§ 6–11, 68 Stat. 775, 777–780. In view of the length of the Act and the complex interlocking of its numerous sections and subsections, a summarization of its principal provisions may be helpful to the Court. Rather than a mere section-by section summary, the effort will be to present an over-all view showing the structure of the Act, with emphasis on the essentials of the registration scheme and the nature of the so-called "sanctions", or legal consequences which attach to an organization's act of registering (or being ordered to register), both as they affect the organization itself, considered as an entity, and as they affect individual members of the organization and others.

1. The congressional findings as to the necessity for the legislation

Section 2 sets forth in fifteen numbered paragraphs certain findings—based on "evidence adduced before various committees of the Senate and House of Representatives"—which convinced Congress of the necessity for the legislation. Congress found, for example, that "[t]here exists a world Communist movement" consisting of a "world-wide revolutionary movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization" (§ 2 (1)). The "direction and control" of this movement was found to be "vested in and exercised by the Communist dictatorship of a foreign country," not named in the Act (§ 2 (4)). This foreign Communist dictatorship, it was further found, establishes "action organizations" in various countries, these organizations being "sections of a world-wide Communist organization" and controlled by the foreign dictatorship (§ 2 (5)). These "Communist-action organizations" seek to bring about "the overthrow of existing governments by any available means, including force if necessary" and to set up in their stead local Communist dictatorships subservient to the parent dictatorship (§ 2 (6)). These Communist organizations "are organized on a secret, conspiratorial basis" and operate to a substantial extent through organizations known as "Communist fronts," which are maintained and used so as to conceal their true character and membership (§ 2 (7)). Finally, Congress found (§ 2 (15))—

[15] Exclusive of a 1952 amendment increasing the salaries of Board members from $12,500 to $15,000 per annum (Act of July 12, 1952, c. 697, 66 Stat. 590), and a 1955 amendment relating to tenure of Board members (Subversive Activities Control Board Tenure Act, Pub. Law 254, 84th Cong., 1st sess., August 5, 1955, 69 Stat. 539).

> The Communist movement in the United States is an organization numbering thousands of adherents, rigidly and ruthlessly disciplined. Awaiting and seeking to advance a moment when the United States may be so far extended by foreign engagements, so far divided in counsel, or so far in industrial or financial straits, that overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence may seem possible of achievement, it seeks converts far and wide by an extensive system of schooling and indoctrination. Such preparations by Communist organizations in other countries have aided in supplanting existing governments. The Communist organization in the United States, pursuing its stated objectives, the recent successes of Communist methods in other countries, and the nature and control of the world Communist movement itself, present a clear and present danger to the security of the United States and to the existence of free American institutions, and make it necessary that Congress, in order to provide for the common defense, to preserve the sovereignty of the United States as an independent nation, and to guarantee to each State a republican form of government, enact appropriate legislation recognizing the existence of such world-wide conspiracy and designed to prevent it from accomplishing its purpose in the United States.

2. "Communist-action" and "Communist-front" organizations

"Communist-action organization."—The Act defines a "Communist-action organization" as "any organization in the United States" other than one diplomatically accredited which "is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement referred to in section 2" and which "operates primarily to advance the objectives" of that movement "as referred to in section 2" (§ 3 (3)).

"Communist-front organization."—A "Communist-front organization" is defined as "any organization in the United States" which is "substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by a Communist-action organization" and "is primarily operated for the purpose of giving aid and support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement" (§ 3 (4)).

3. The registration scheme

The heart of the Act—the organizational registration requirement—is contained in § 7.

The duty of Communist-action and Communist-front organizations to register with the Attorney General.—Each Communist-action organization (§ 7 (a)) and each Communist-front organization (§ 7 (b)) is required to "register with the Attorney General on a form prescribed by him by regulations" as the one or the other type of organization. Registration is to be effected within 30 days after enactment of the Act (§ 7 (c) (1)), or, in the case of an organization which becomes registerable after the Act's passage, within 30 days after becoming registerable (§ 7 (c) (2)). In the case of an organization which does not voluntarily register and which is subsequently ordered to register by the Subversive Activities Control Board, registration must be effected within 30 days after the Board's order becomes final [16] (§ 7 (c) (3)).

The registration statement.—The registration process includes the submission of a registration statement, to be prepared in accordance with regulations, containing certain specified information (§ 7 (d)). The information is to include (1) the name and address of the organization, (2) the name, address, title, and duties of each officer of the organization, including each person who has been an officer at any time during the preceding year, (3) an accounting of all funds received and spent by the organization during the preceding year, including the sources of the funds and the purposes of the expenditures, (4) (applicable to action organizations only) the name and address of each member of the organization, including each person who has been a member at any time during the preceding year, (5) any aliases that may ever have been used by any officer or member required to be listed, and (6)[17] a list of all printing presses and other mechanical devices used in printing in the possession or control of the organization, its officers, or members.

Annual reports.—Annual reports are required to be submitted to keep the initial registration statement up to date (§ 7 (e)).

Records required to be kept.—Accurate financial records are required to be kept by all registered organizations (§ 7 (f) (1)). In addition, action organizations are required to keep accurate membership lists (§ 7 (f) (2)).

Remedies open to persons claiming to be wrongly listed.—Section 7 (g) provides certain remedies for persons who are listed by reporting organizations as being officers or members and who deny they are such. The Attorney General is required to notify all individuals whom reporting organizations list as officers or members that they have been so listed. Any listed individual who denies that he is an officer or member may request the Attorney General to strike his name from the statement. In such event, the Attorney General is required to investigate the matter, and if he is satisfied that the denial is correct, he is to strike the individual's name. If he is not satisfied that the denial is correct and declines to strike the name, or if he fails to strike it within five months after receiving the request, the individual may petition the Board for relief pursuant to § 13 (b) (see infra, p. 78).

Publication to constitute notice.—Upon the registration of an organization, the Attorney General is required to publish in the Federal Register the fact that the organization has registered as a Communist-action or Communist-front organization as the case may be (§ 9 (d)). Such publication, it is provided, "shall constitute notice to all members of such organization that such organization has so registered" (ibid.).

Keeping of registers.—The Attorney General is required to keep registers of all organizations which register, consisting of the names and addresses of the organizations and their registration statements and annual reports (§ 9 (a)). The registers are to be open to public inspection, except that the name of any person listed by an organization as being an officer or member who denies his status as such may not be made public pending determination by the Attorney General of the correctness of the listing (§ 9 (b)).

4. Proceedings before the Board leading to orders requiring organizations to register

Section 13 of the Act provides for quasi-judicial proceedings before the Subversive Activities Control Board leading to orders requiring, or refusing to require, organizations claimed by the Attorney General to be action or front groups to register with him as such. The Board itself is established and its general powers and functions defined in § 12.

The petition by the Attorney General.—Whenever the Attorney General has reason to believe that any organization which has not registered under § 7 (a) as an action organization or under § 7 (b) as a front organization "is in fact an organization of a kind required to be registered under such subsection," he is required to file with the Board and serve upon the organization a petition for an order requiring the organization to register (§ 13 (a)).

Hearings before the Board.—Upon the filing of such a petition, the Board (or any member or a designated examiner) holds a hearing to inquire into the facts regarding the organization's registerability (§ 13 (c)). The administration of oaths and the issuance of subpoenas are provided for (ibid.). Hearings are public, and each party is entitled to present its case with the assistance of counsel, to offer oral or documentary evidence, and to cross-examine opposing witnesses (§ 13 (d)).

Types of evidence required to be considered.—Section 13 (e) sets forth in eight numbered paragraphs certain types of evidence which the Board is required to consider in determining whether an organization is a Communist-action organization under § 3 (3). For example, the Board is to take into consideration—

> (1) the extent to which its [the organization's] policies are carried out and its activities performed, pursuant to directives or to effectuate the policies of the foreign government or foreign organization in which is vested, or under the domination or control of which is exercised, the direction and control of the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 * * *.

Similarly, § 13 (f) sets forth evidential factors required to be taken into consideration in determining whether an organization is a front group under § 3 (4).

Reports and orders.—If the Board determines that the organization is a Communist-action or Communist-front organization, it must make a report stating its findings of fact and issue an order requiring the organization to register (§ 13 (g) (1)). If it determines that the organization is not such a group, it so reports and issues an order denying the Attorney General's petition (§ 13 (h) (1)).

Publication to constitute notice.—When an order of the Board requiring registration of a Communist-action organization becomes final (see infra, p. 79), that fact must be published in the Federal Register, and such publication is declared to "constitute notice to all members of such organization that such order has become final" (§ 13 (k)).

5. The duty of individuals to register under certain circumstances

The Act also imposes upon individuals a duty to register under certain circumstances.

(a) Officers required to effect an organization's registration

If a Communist-action or Communist-front organization should fail to register or to file a registration statement or annual report as required by § 7, it is the duty of the executive officer and of the secretary of the organization (or the individuals performing the usual duties of such officers), and of such other officers as the Attorney General may by regulations prescribe,[18] to register for the organization or to file the registration statement or annual report, as the case may be (§ 7 (h)).

[18] Pursuant to the authority thus vested in him, the Attorney General has designated the following additional officers as sharing with those named in the Act the responsibility of effecting the registration of an organization which is required to register but fails to do so: (a) the president, chairman, or other person who is chief officer; (b) the vice-president, vice-chairman, or person performing the functions of either; (c) the treasurer; and (d) members of the governing board, council, or body (28 C. F. R. § 11.205).

(b) Personal registration by members of Communist-action organizations

Conditions under which required.—The Act specifies two conditions under which members of a Communist-action organization are required to register personally with the Attorney General. First, if there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring the organization to register and more than 30 days elapse without compliance, it becomes the duty of each member of the organization to register personally (§ 8 (a)). Secondly, if a Communist-action organization registers but fails to include the names of all its members on the membership list it files, each member not on the list who knows the organization to be registered and to have omitted his name must himself register within 60 days after obtaining such knowledge (§ 8 (b)). In either case, the individual is required to file a registration statement containing such information as the Attorney General may by regulations prescribe (§ 8 (c)).

Proceedings before the Board.—If an individual who the Attorney General believes is required to register under § 8 does not in fact register, the Attorney General may petition the Board (as in the case of an organization) for an order requiring the individual to register (§ 13 (a)).

Hearings.—The Attorney General's petition is heard by the Board in the same manner as a petition for an order requiring an organization to register (supra, pp. 73–74) (§ 13 (c) and (d)).

Reports and orders.—In each instance the Board must make a report stating its findings and issue an order either requiring the individual to register (§ 13 (g) (2)) or denying the Attorney General's petition (§ 13 (h) (2)).

6. Fact of registration not admissible in any criminal prosecution and membership not to constitute per se a violation of any criminal statute

The fact of the registration of any person as an officer or member of any Communist-action or Communist-front organization may not be received in evidence against such person in any prosecution for any alleged violation of any criminal statute (§ 4 (f)). In addition, neither the holding of office nor membership in any Communist organization by any person shall constitute per se a violation of any criminal statute (ibid.).

7. Cancellation of registration

The Act establishes procedures whereby an individual or an organization which has once registered—whether with or without an order of the Board commanding him or it to do so—may procure the cancellation of his or its registration in the event of a change in the circumstances which originally required registration.

Application to the Attorney General.—Any organization registered under § 7 as an action or front group, and any individual registered under § 8 (see supra, pp. 76–77), may, not oftener than once in each calendar year, make application to the Attorney General for the cancellation of such registration (§ 13 (b)).

Petition to the Board.—If the Attorney General denies the application, the organization or individual concerned may, within 60 days after such denial, file with the Board and serve upon the Attorney General a petition for an order requiring the cancellation of registration (§ 13 (b)). Section 13 (b) further provides that any individual whose name the Attorney General has declined pursuant to § 7 (g) to strike from an organization's registration statement listing him as an officer or member (see supra, pp. 71–72) may similarly petition the Board for an order requiring the Attorney General to strike his name.

Hearings.—The petition is heard by the Board in the same manner as a petition by the Attorney General requesting that an organization or individual be directed to register (§ 13 (c) and (d)).

Reports and orders.—In each case the Board must make a report stating its findings and issue an order granting (§ 13 (i)) or denying (§ 13 (j)) the petition.

8. Judicial review and finality of Board orders

The Act provides that any party aggrieved by any order of the Board be given full opportunity for judicial review in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit (or the circuit of the petitioning party's residence), with the possibility of further discretionary review by this Court on writ or certiorari (§ 14 (a)). On such review the Board's findings of fact, if supported by the preponderance of the evidence, are conclusive (ibid.).

Exhaustion of judicial review a prerequisite to an order of the Board becoming final.—An order of the Board does not become final, i. e., enforceable, until full opportunity for judicial review has been exhausted or until review is foreclosed by failure to make timely application therefor (§ 14 (b)).

9. The so-called "sanctions", or legal consequences of an organization's registration or of a final order to register

When an organization registers under § 7, or when an order of the Board under § 13 requiring an organization to register becomes final under § 14 (b), the Act provides for the immediate occurrence of certain legal consequences—some affecting the organization as such, others affecting members of the organization. These consequences are, generally speaking, in the nature of legal disabilities; they have come to be referred to in these proceedings as "sanctions" (see Op. 5, R. 2082), though this term is not used in the Act. In addition, upon the registration of an organization or when an order directing it to register becomes final, certain limitations are imposed upon the conduct of officers and employees of the United States and of "defense facilities", as defined in the Act, with respect to their relations with the organization and its members. These various legal consequences may be summarized and classified as follows:

(a) Consequences to the organization as such

The "labeling" requirements.—When an organization is registered or has been finally ordered to register, any publication of the organization transmitted by mail or in interstate or foreign commerce and intended to be circulated among two or more persons must bear on its face and on any wrapper in which it is contained the printed statement "Disseminated by [name of organization], a Communist organization" (§ 10 (1)). Similarly, radio and television broadcasts sponsored by the group must be identified as being "sponsored by [name of organization], a Communist organization (§ 10 (2)). Violation of these provisions by the organization or by any person acting on its behalf is made a punishable offense (§§ 10, 15 (c)).

Denial of tax benefits.—Persons making contributions to any organization which is registered or has been finally ordered to register may not deduct the amount of their contributions from their gross taxable income notwithstanding any other provisions of law (§ 11 (a)), and no such organization may claim any tax-exemption privilege specified in § 101 of the Internal Revenue Code (§ 11 (b)).

(b) Consequences to members of the organization

Employment restrictions.—Section 5 (a) (1) provides that members of an organization having knowledge or notice that the organization is registered or has been finally ordered to register are prohibited from (A) concealing or failing to disclose their membership in seeking, accepting, or holding any nonelective federal employment, (B) holding such employment, (C) concealing or failing to disclose their membership in seeking, accepting, or holding employment in any defense facility,[19] (D) working in any defense facility

[19] A "defense facility" is defined in § 3 (7) as any plant, factory, airport, vessel, pier, etc. "designated and proclaimed by the Secretary of Defense pursuant to section 5 (b)." Section 5 (b) authorizes the Secretary of Defense to designate and proclaim, and from time to time revise, a list of facilities with respect to the operation of which he finds that "the security of the United States requires the application of the provisions of" § 5 (a). Section 5 (b) further provides for the publication of the list and revisions thereof in the Federal Register and the posting of notices of such designation in conspicuous places on the premises of listed facilities.

(this clause is applicable only to members of action organizations), or (E)[20] holding office in or being employed by any "labor organization" as defined in the National Labor Relations Act[21] or representing any employer in proceedings under that Act.

Passports.—Members of an organization having knowledge or notice that the organization is registered or has been finally ordered to register are prohibited from applying for, seeking to renew, using, or attempting to use any passport issued under the authority of the United States (§ 6 (a)).

Provisions applicable to aliens.—Alien members of or aliens affiliated with organizations which are registered or have been finally ordered to register are excluded from admission into the United States, are deportable, and are ineligible for naturalization.[22] The joining of or affiliating

[22] These provisions were originally contained in §§ 22 and 25 of the Subversive Activities Control Act, which amended the immigration and naturalization laws so to provide. They are now contained in the Immigration and Nationality Act of June 27, 1952, c. 477, 66 Stat. 163, §§ 212 (a) (28) (E) (exclusion), 241 (a) (6) (E) (deportation), and 313 (a) (2)

(c) Consequences to government and defense-facility employees in their relations with the organization and its members

If the alien can establish that he did not know the organization in question to be a Communist organization when he joined it and did not acquire such knowledge prior to the time it registered or was required to register, the provisions are by their terms inapplicable (except that members of action organizations are declared ineligible for naturalization without such qualifying language).

fact, are prohibited from contributing funds or services to such group (§ 5 (a) (2) (A)).

Counseling violation of employment provisions.—Section 5 (a) (2) (B) makes it a punishable offense for an officer or employee of the United States or of any defense facility, with knowledge or notice that an organization is registered or has been finally ordered to register, to advise or counsel any person whom he knows to be a member of such organization to perform or omit the performance of any act the performance or omission of which would constitute a violation of the employment provisions of § 5 (a) (1) (see supra, pp. 81–82).

Issuance of passports.—When an organization is registered or has been finally ordered to register as a Communist-action organization, officers and employees of the United States are prohibited from issuing passports to or renewing the passports of any individual who they know or have reason to believe is a member of such organization (§ 6 (b)).

10. Criminal penalties

Organizations.—Any organization which has been directed by a final order of the Board to register and which fails to do so within the time allowed, or which fails to file a required registration statement or annual report or to keep records as required, is punishable for each such offense by a fine of not more than $10,000 (§ 15 (a) (1)). Each day of failure to register is a separate offense (§ 15 (a)). Each violation of the labeling provisions of § 10 (see supra, p. 80) is similarly punishable (§ 15 (c)).

Individuals.—Each individual officer having a duty under § 7 (h) to register or to file a registration statement or annual report on behalf of an organization which has been finally ordered to register (see supra, pp. 75–76) is punishable for each failure to fulfill such duty by a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both (§ 15 (a) (2)). Each individual having a duty to register personally under § 8 (see supra, p. 76) is similarly punishable, provided there is in effect with respect to him a final order of the Board requiring him to do so (§ 15 (a) (2); see supra, pp. 76–77, 79). In either case, each day of failure to register is a separate offense (§ 15 (a)). The willful making of a false statement or the willful omission of a fact required to be stated is similarly punishable (§ 15 (b)). Each false statement or willful omission constitutes a separate offense (§ 15 (b) (1)), and each listing of the name or address of any one individual is to be deemed a separate statement (§ 15 (b) (2)).

Any individual who violates any of the employment provisions or the contributions prohibition of § 5 (see supra, pp. 81–82, 83–84), the passport provisions of § 6 (see supra, pp. 82, 84), or the labeling provisions of § 10 (see supra, p. 80) is similarly punishable for each such offense by a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both (§ 15 (c)).

Act not to affect previously existing criminal statutes.—The Act provides that its provisions are to be construed as being "in addition to and not in modification of existing criminal statutes" (§ 17).

11: Communist-infiltrated organizations

The Act as originally passed defined and dealt with but two types of "Communist organization" (§ 3 (5))—the Communist-action organization (§ 3 (3)) and the Communist-front organization (§ 3 (4)). The Communist Control Act of 1954, c. 886, §§ 7–11, 68 Stat. 775, 777–780, amended the Act so as to define a third category of Communist organization, viz, the "Communist-infiltrated organization," and to enact various restrictive measures with respect to such groups.

Communist-infiltrated organizations are not subject to the registration requirements of the Act. They are, however, subject to Board orders "determining" them to be Communist-infiltrated, which orders, when they become final, entail for such groups some of the same legal consequences which attach to action and front groups when registered or directed to register by a final

Board order. "Infiltrated" organizations are defined in § 3 (4A). Proceedings leading to a Board order determining an organization to be Communist-infiltrated are provided for in § 13A. Such orders are reviewable in the same manner as other orders of the Board (§ 14). The legal consequences which flow from a final Board order determining a group to be infiltrated are set forth in §§ 10, 11, 13A (h), and 13A (j).

12. Separability clause

The Act contains the customary separability clause providing that if any of its provisions or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remaining provisions, or the application to other persons or circumstances of any provisions held invalid as to some, shall not be affected thereby (§ 32).

II

THE SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL ACT IS CONSTITUTIONAL AS APPLIED TO PETITIONER

As we have already pointed out (supra, p. 42), what is immediately before the Court is (a) the Board's finding that the Communist Party of the United States is a Communist-action organization under the Act, and (b) the Board's order that the Party register as such. The court below thought that the Act is an "integrated unit" (Op. 4–7, R. 2081–2084), and that even at this stage the registration requirements cannot be considered separately from certain of the statutory sanctions "which depend upon or flow from registration of the organization" (Op. 6, R. 2083). This view may well be correct. But it is also conceivable that—as respondent argued below—the Court may wish to defer passing upon the sanctions (or some of them) until they actually come into play, for the registration provisions—which are directly involved in this proceeding—have a purpose and vitality independent of any sanction.[25] In any event, the Act's separability clause (supra, p. 87) makes it clear that the registration provisions would survive even if one or more of the sanctions should be held invalid. Cf. Electric Bond and Share Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 303 U. S. 419.

For these reasons, we shall first consider petitioner's contentions that the hearing and registration provisions are invalid as violative of the free-speech, self-incrimination, and due-process clauses of the Constitution (infra, pp. 89–162). We shall then separately reply to the arguments that the sanctions, which become operative when an order of the Board directing an organization to register becomes final, are invalid on various constitutional grounds (infra, pp. 162–209). In both aspects, we shall consider the Act's provisions only in so far as they apply to the Communist-action type of group; petitioner has been ordered to register as such a group, and no Communist-front organization—the other type subject to the registration provisions—is before the Court. See United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75, 89–90; Watson v. Buck, 313 U. S. 387, 402; Electric Bond and Share Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 303 U. S. 419, 433–439, 443; Peters v. Hobby, 349 U. S. 331, 338.

A. THE HEARING AND REGISTRATION PROVISIONS ARE VALID

1. The First Amendment does not prohibit Congress from requiring registration of, and disclosure of information by, domestic organizations dominated by foreign agencies whose purpose it is to establish a Communist dictatorship in this country

The heart of the Act is the requirement that Communist-action organizations register with the Attorney General, disclose the names of their officers and members, and give financial accountings (supra, pp. 69–71, 73–74). A Communist-action organization is defined as any organization in the United States, other than one diplomatically accredited, which is substantially dominated or controlled by "the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement" and which operates primarily to advance the objectives of that movement (supra, p. 69). The "world Communist movement" referred to is that "worldwide revolutionary movement" which Congress found to exist, "whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization" (supra, p. 67). After full hearing, the Communist Party has been found to be such a group. Congress has the power to require it to register and disclose information. There is no violation of the First Amendment.

(a) Rights of free speech and press may be indirectly restrained in proper circumstances

There is, of course, no better settled principle of constitutional law than that the freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment are not absolute. E. g., Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47, 52; Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 508. Even direct limitations on the freedoms protected by that Amendment are permissible where clearly necessary to the effectuation by Congress of an end within its power to bring about. Schenck v. United States, supra, at 52; Dennis v. United States, supra, at 509–510. A fortiori, indirect limitations come within the rule. American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 402–404.

The law is filled with examples of statutes which place indirect restraints on freedom of speech or of the press, but which are nevertheless valid because the statute's objective lies within the power of Congress to bring about, and the restraint is a necessary and appropriate concomitant of the exercise of the power. The Hatch Act validly forbids the taking of active part in political campaigns by officers and employees in the executive branch of the Federal Government (Act of August 2, 1939, c. 410, § 9, 53 Stat. 1148; 5 U. S. C. § 118i), notwithstanding the obvious restraints imposed by that Act on such officers' and employees' freedom of speech and political expression. United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75, 94–104. The Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act (Act of August 2, 1946, c. 753, Title III, §§ 305, 307, 308, 60 Stat. 840–842; 2 U. S. C. §§ 264, 266, 267) validly requires all "those who for hire attempt to influence legislation or who collect or spend funds for that purpose" to spread on the record pertinent information as to "who is being hired, who is putting up the money, and how much", notwithstanding the incidental inhibitory effect of this requirement on the exercise of First Amendment freedoms. United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 625–626. The Federal Corrupt Practices Act validly requires all political committees which accept contributions or make expenditures for the purpose of influencing national elections to keep exact accounts of all such contributions and to report publicly the names and addresses of all contributors as well as of persons to whom such expenditures are made (Act of February 28, 1925, c. 368, Title III, §§ 302–305, 43 Stat. 1070–1072; 2 U. S. C. §§ 241–244), though here, too, the requirement unquestionably imposes indirect restraints upon freedom of political expression. Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, 290 U. S. 534.

The unfair-labor-practice provisions of the National Labor Relations Act have led to certain valid restraints on free speech. National Labor Relations Board v. Virginia Elec. & Power Co., 314 U. S. 469; National Labor Relations Board v. Falk Corp., 308 U. S. 453. Newspaper companies are subject to regulation in the public interest, notwithstanding possible incidental restrictive effects on their freedom to publish. Associated Press v. National Labor Relations Board, 301 U. S. 103, 130–133; Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1, 19–20; Mabee v. White Plains Publishing Co., 327 U. S. 178, 184; Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U. S. 186, 192–193; Lorain Journal v. United States, 342 U. S. 143, 155–156. Radio broadcasting stations engaging in discriminatory practices can be denied licenses without unlawfully encroaching on First Amendment rights, despite the indirect restraint on freedom of speech which may result from such denials. National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U. S. 190, 226–227.

Likewise, the Foreign Agents Registration Act validly requires agents of foreign principals to register with the Attorney General and to submit a mass of detailed information relating to the agency relationship (Act of June 8, 1938, c. 327, 52 Stat. 631–633; 22 U. S. C. §§ 611 ff.). United States v. Peace Information Center, 97 F. Supp. 255, 261–263 (D. D. C.); see also Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, 241, where the constitutionality of the Act was assumed. The National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, validly denies the benefits of that Act to labor organizations unless each officer takes oath that he is not a member of the Communist Party (Act of July 5, 1935, c. 372, § 9 (h), as amended by the Act of June 23, 1947, c. 120, § 101, 61 Stat. 146; 29 U. S. C. § 159 (h)). American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 389–412. The postal laws validly require the publishers of newspapers and magazines, as a condition of their use of second-class mail facilities, publicly to disclose the names of the owners of these publications and to mark with the word "advertisement" all contents the insertion of which has been paid for (Act of August 24, 1912, c. 389, § 2, 37 Stat 553; now 39 U. S. C. §§ 233, 234);

Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 229 U. S. 288. The Court has also upheld the provisions of a state statute requiring that associations having an oath-bound membership file with a state official sworn copies of their constitutions, oaths of membership, and the names of all officers and members. Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U. S. 63, 72–73.

In all these and similar cases, the question was not whether some indirect, incidental restraint on complete freedom of speech or of the press might result from the enforcement of the law enacted by the legislature. That there would be some such restraint was apparent in all these cases. The question was whether the objective of Congress was one within its power to seek to effect and, if so, whether the incidental restraint was appropriate and reasonable under all the circumstances, including the end sought to be achieved by the law, as well as the nature, impact and scope of the restraint.

The evil aimed at by the Hatch Act was the bad effect on government service of "political activity by government employees." United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75, 95. The Regulation of Lobbying Act was aimed at the danger that "the voice of the people" might go unheard by Congress due to being "drowned out by the voice of special interest groups seeking favored treatment while masquerading as proponents of the public weal." United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 625. The harm sought to be eliminated by the Corrupt Practices Act was "the corrupt use of money to affect elections." Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, 290 U. S. 534, 548. The injury at which the Foreign Agents Registration Act was directed was the "spreading [of] foreign propaganda" in this country by unidentified agents of foreign principals. Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, 241. The evil aimed at by the non-Communist affidavit clause of the amended National Labor Relations Act was the obstruction of commerce due to "political strikes." American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 387–389. In all these cases, the fact that incidental and indirect restraints upon First Amendment freedoms resulted from the steps taken by Congress to combat those evils was held not to invalidate the legislative remedy adopted. However, the evils at which those statutes were directed, grave as they were, were relatively trivial compared to the evil at which this Act strikes.

That evil is nothing other than the threatened destruction, through force, violence, and deceit, of our constitutional form of government, the loss of our national independence and of our cherished liberties, and the passing of the nation under the domination of a ruthless foreign dictatorship (§ 2). The world Communist movement, including its domestic manifestations, declared Congress in summing up the purposes of the Act, presents "a clear and present danger to the security of the United States and to the existence of free American institutions, and make[s] it necessary that Congress, in order to provide for the common defense, to preserve the sovereignty of the United States as an independent nation, and to guarantee to each State a republican form of government, enact appropriate legislation recognizing the existence of such world-wide conspiracy and designed to prevent it from accomplishing its purpose in the United States" (§ 2 (15)).

It is obviously a matter of the gravest concern that there exists in this country such a highly organized conspiratorial group controlled and dominated by a foreign country or foreign organization, the principal efforts of which are directed to furthering the interests of that foreign country or organization to the detriment of the United States. "Antipathy to domination or control by a foreign government," as the court below observed (Op. 8, R. 2085), "or even to interference on the part of a foreign government, is a basic policy in this nation. It was one of the compelling reasons for the making of the Constitution in replacement of the Confederation. * * *".

As we have seen, Congress has for more than twenty years regarded the threat to the United States represented by the Communist movement as a legitimate subject of congressional inquiry and legislation (supra, pp. 44–65; and see pp. 216–228 of the Internal Security Manual, S. Doc. No. 47, 83d Cong., 1st sess., where the many hearings held by committees of Congress investigating subversive activities from 1930 to 1953 are synopsized). The general power of Congress not only to conduct inquiries in this area, but to legislate on the basis of the information thus obtained, has been repeatedly recognized by this Court as well as others. E. g., Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, 529; Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 534–536; Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U. S. 580, 590; Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494; American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 387–389; Lawson v. United States, 176 F. 2d 49, 51–52 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 339 U. S. 934; Barsky v. United States, 167 F. 2d 241, 244–247 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 334 U. S. 843; United States v. Josephson, 165 F. 2d 82, 88–92 (C. A. 2), certiorari denied, 333 U. S. 838.

(c) In the light of the evil, the registration requirement does not invalidly restrict free speech, press, or association

In the survey we have given of the cases in which the Court upheld legislation touching upon the constitutionally protected areas of political association and expression of ideas (supra, pp. 90–94), "disclosure" cases are prominent. United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 625 (Registration of Lobbying Act); Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, 290 U. S. 534 (Federal Corrupt Practices Act); Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U. S. 63 (New York Anti-Ku-Klux-Klan statute); Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 229 U. S. 288 (ownership-disclosure requirements of the postal laws); cf. Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236 (Foreign Agents Registration Act).

The basic rationale underlying all these decisions is that it is in the interest of both free speech and free association that Congress and the public be adequately and correctly informed, at least where the dangers stemming from non-disclosure are serious. As Mr. Justice Black, with whom Mr. Justice Douglas concurred, stated with respect to the Foreign Agents Registration Act in his dissenting opinion in Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, 251:[26]

> * * * Resting on the fundamental constitutional principle that our people, ade> quately informed, may be trusted to distinguish between the true and the false, the bill is intended to label information of foreign origin so that hearers and readers may not be deceived by the belief that the information comes from a disinterested source. Such legislation implements rather than detracts from the prized freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment. * * *

[26] The constitutionality of the Foreign Agents Registration Act was not challenged in the Viereck case, either in the Court of Appeals (Viereck v. United States, 130 F. 2d 945 (C. A. D. C.), reversed, 318 U. S. 236; Viereck v. United States, 139 F. 2d 847 (affirming conviction following retrial), certiorari denied, 321 U. S. 794), or in this Court. This Court's reversal of Viereck's first conviction was based on grounds not here material.

See also United States v. Peace Information Center, 97 F. Supp. 255 (D. D. C.). And the Harriss decision pointed out (347 U. S. at 625–626) the importance of disclosure of facts where a serious evil grows out of secrecy or nondisclosure.[27]

In the light of our knowledge of the world Communist movement and of the evil to be faced (supra, pp. 44–65, 95–97), there would seem to be little doubt that this device of registration and disclosure can properly be applied to the Communist

[27] In addition to judicial approval, the principle of registration and disclosure has been widely recognized by legal writers as a constitutional and desirable remedy against potential abuses of political freedoms. See To Secure These Rights, Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights (1947), p. 164; Smith, Democratic Control of Propaganda Through Registration and Disclosure, 6 Pub. Opin. Quart. 27 (1942); Institute of Living Law, Combating Totalitarian Propaganda: The Method of Suppression, 37 Ill. (Northwestern Univ.) L. Rev. 193, 213; Ernst and Katz, Speech: Public and Private, 53 Col. L. Rev. 620, 626; Nutting, Freedom of Silence: Constitutional Protection Against Governmental Intrusions in Political Affairs, 47 Mich. L. Rev. 181, 204–213.

Party, now that it has been found, after full hearing, to be directed and controlled by the Soviet Union and to be operating primarily to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement. See Sutherland, Freedom and Internal Security (1951), 64 Harv. L. Rev. 383, 406–407. If the leaders of the Communist Party may be imprisoned for conspiring to advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence (Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494; see also fn. 8a, supra, p. 49), certainly the Party itself may be compelled to register and disclose its officers, members, funds, and operations. Whatever diminution of the Party's influence or effectiveness results from this publicity—including a possible falling-off in its "peaceful" and "non-seditious" activities—is a valid consequence of the Government's and the public's right to be informed about this particular organization's activities and connections. Its seditious connection with the Soviet Union plainly warrants the kind of disclosure Congress has required. See also, infra, pp. 165–178, for further discussion in connection with the "labeling" sanction.

Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, on which petitioner relies, dealt with the wholly different problem of a state's requirement that any individual must register as a condition of the exercise of his normal right to make a lawful public speech enlisting support for a lawful and peaceful movement (the trade union movement) and a peaceful and lawful activity (joining a labor union). There was no problem of sedition, subversion, or of a domestic organization controlled by a foreign dictatorship and dedicated to forcible overthrow of this Government. See Sutherland, Freedom and Internal Security (1951), 64 Harv. L. Rev. 383, 403–404. And insofar as the registration provisions of the present Act may curtail the "peaceful" and "non-seditious" utterances and activities (but see infra, pp. 166–167) of the Communist Party, De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353, is clearly inapposite. There, the disability imposed was criminal punishment (299 U. S. at 365), not the much milder form of "restraint" in the form of registration and disclosure requirements; and it is also not without significance that the circumstances of the De Jonge case took place in an earlier era (1934), before most of the more significant events occurred and the knowledge was acquired on which the present Act is grounded (see supra, pp. 45–49, 56–61).

2. Neither the registration provisions of the Act nor the Board's order violates the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against compulsory self-incrimination

Petitioner also urges (Br. 82–90) that the registration provisions of the Act as well as the order under review, directing it to register, violate the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against compulsory self-incrimination. "The legislative scheme of the Act," it argues, "culminates in an attempt to coerce confessions of membership in the Communist Party * * *. This is a crass violation of the privilege against self-incrimination. Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159" (Pet. 59; Br. 83). The contention is without merit for a number of reasons.

(a) The privilege against self-incrimination applies only to natural individuals, of whom there is none before the Court at this time; the present case is not a proper vehicle for the litigation of self-incrimination issues

It is settled that the privilege against self-incrimination "is essentially a personal one, applying only to natural individuals." United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694, 698. It may be invoked neither by a corporation (Wilson v. United States, 221 U. S. 361; Essgee Co. v. United States, 262 U. S. 151, 155–156; Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U. S. 186, 205) nor by an unincorporated organization or association, such as petitioner. United States v. White, supra, 322 U. S. 694, 699. The order under review is directed against petitioner alone, not against any natural individual, and petitioner alone is before the Court at this time. While it is true that artificial entities such as corporations and unincorporated associations can act only through individuals, sight must not be lost of the simple fact that only natural individuals are protected by the privilege and no such individual is a party to this case.

Assuming arguendo that the officer or officers who will eventually have the duty to effect the registration of petitioner will be personally privileged to decline to do so, or at least to assert and litigate a claim of privilege, that fact does not render either the registration provisions of the Act or the registration order invalid. Consequently, the instant case is not an appropriate vehicle for the litigation of the self-incrimination issue, which is entirely hypothetical at this time.

(i) The privilege against self-incrimination is one which must be explicitly claimed and no such claim has thus far been made; it cannot be assumed that a claim will inevitably be made or, if made, that it must necessarily be honored

In the first place, the privilege against self-incrimination is a privilege which must be personally and explicitly claimed. Quinn v. United States, 349 U. S. 155, 162; Emspak v. United States, 349 U. S. 190, 194; Rogers v. United States, 340 U. S. 367, 370; Smith v. United States, 337 U. S. 137, 150; United States v. Monia, 317 U. S. 424, 427; United States v. Murdock, 284 U. S. 141, 148; Vajtauer v. Commissioner of Immigration, 273 U. S. 103, 113. "A witness' privilege against self-incrimination," as Judge Bazelon himself stated in an opinion rendered prior to his dissent below, at an earlier stage of this case, "must be claimed personally, at the time the alleged incriminating questions are propounded, not before they are asked at all" (Communist Party of the United States v. McGrath, 96 F. Supp. 47, 52 (D. D. C.) (concurring opinion), stay denied, 340 U. S. 950). It is "merely an option of refusal, not a prohibition of inquiry." 8 Wigmore, Evidence (3d. ed. 1940), § 2268.

There has been no claim of privilege thus far, and, as the court below observed (Op. 19–20, R. 2096–2097), there may never be one. Since this Court does not anticipate constitutional issues (Peters v. Hobby, 349 U. S. 331, 338), petitioner's attempt to litigate the self-incrimination issue in this case, before it is raised, would clearly seem to be premature on general principles. Cf. Electric Bond & Share Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 303 U. S. 419, 443. The question of the availability of the privilege to an officer or officers of petitioner will not arise until the order of the Board becomes final and the duty to bring about petitioner's registration comes into being. If at that time a privilege is claimed, it can then be litigated.

Petitioner argues, however, that the principle requiring that the privilege be claimed to be enjoyed is inapplicable in a proceeding of this type for the reason that "the Act gives the officers no opportunity to claim the privilege and provides no tribunal before which they can make the claim" (Br. 87). The contention is untenable. As petitioner acknowledges (ibid.), the Act provides a 30-day period after a registration order becomes final within which to effect registration (§ 7 (c) (3)) before criminal liability under § 15 (a) for failure to register is incurred. We believe that that is the period during which an officer of petitioner having the duty to effect petitioner's registration, who desires to claim the privilege, should do so. As for the "tribunal" before which the claim should be made, we believe that United States v. Sullivan, 274 U. S. 259, provides the answer. In that case the Court held that a taxpayer should make his claim of privilege respecting his sources of income in the tax return itself if necessary. So here, by analogy, the privilege could be claimed on the registration form required to be filed with the Attorney General. (See also infra, pp. 117–121).

There are, moreover, several reasons why it cannot justifiably be assumed at this time that a substantial claim of privilege will inevitably be made and be required to be honored when petitioner is confronted by the statutory requirement that it register, so that (according to the argument) the constitutionality of the requirement might as well be settled in this proceeding.

a. Presumably, the basis of any future claim of privilege on the part of an officer of petitioner having the duty to effect the registration will be the tendency of his act of filing the required registration statement to incriminate him under the Smith Act (18 U. S. C. § 2385). That is, it will be claimed by the officer required to file the statement that the very act of filing, even if he were to omit his own name from the membership list, would constitute an admission that he is a member and officer of petitioner, and thus furnish "a link in the chain of evidence" required to convict him under that Act. See Br. 83, citing Patricia Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159, 161. But, as the court below observed, the top officials of petitioner, who are the ones who will have the duty of filing the registration statement,[28] "have never attempted to conceal their membership or their places of leadership" (Op. 20, R. 2097). Hence, there is "no basis for assuming that they would claim protection against a mere revelation of their membership" (ibid.).

Furthermore, a claim of privilege on their part would be on a different footing from a similar claim made by a person not publicly known as a Communist Party member or functionary if he were asked whether he is a member of petitioner.

[28] Section 7 (h) of the Act places the duty of effecting the registration of an organization required by § 7 to register, and which fails to do so, on "the executive officer (or individual performing the ordinary and usual duties of an executive officer)," "the secretary (or individual performing the ordinary and usual duties of a secretary)," and such other "officer or officers * * * as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe." Under the regulations, the following additional officials share the registration duty with those named in the Act: (a) the president, chairman, or chief officer, by whatever title he is known; (b) the vice-president or vice-chairman; (c) the treasurer; and (d) members of the governing board, council, or body (28 C. F. R. § 11.205).

Cf. Patricia Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159; Irving Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 332; Rogers v. United States, 340 U. S. 367, 372–373. It is a matter of common knowledge that each of the individuals who would have the duty of effecting petitioner's registration when the time comes, if petitioner should fail to register itself (see fn. 28, supra, p. 106), is a member and high official of the Party. Many of them have already been prosecuted and convicted under the Smith Act without the benefit of any forced concessions on their part of membership in petitioner. Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494; United States v. Flynn, 216 F. 2d 354 (C. A. 2), certiorari denied, 348 U. S. 909.[29] It is absurd to suppose that a prosecutor, even assuming the Government might ever bring new criminal proceedings against them for violation of the Smith Act, would find it necessary to establish their membership and high official position in petitioner from the fact that they filed a registration statement under the Subversive Activities Control Act. The privilege against self-incrimination, as this Court has emphasized, "presupposes a real danger of legal detriment arising from the disclosure." Rogers v. United States, supra, 340 U. S. 367, 372–373. The protection afforded by the privilege "must be confined to instances where the witness has reasonable cause to apprehend danger from a direct answer. Mason v. United States, 244 U. S. 362, 365 (1917), and cases cited. The witness is not exonerated from answering merely because he declares that in so doing he would incriminate himself—his say-so does not of itself establish the hazard of incrimination." Hoffman v. United States, 341 U. S. 479, 486.

To argue, as does petitioner, that for a member of petitioner's governing board to be required to perform an act which by implication establishes his membership in petitioner amounts to compulsory self-incrimination, when that person has never sought to conceal and indeed has many times conceded his membership, is too mechanical an application of the constitutional guaranty. To force an admission of membership from an obscure or concealed member of petitioner is one thing (cf. Patricia Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159). To require, say, the National Chairman of petitioner to effectuate petitioner's registration under the Act and thus, incidentally, to admit what he has never denied or attempted to conceal and what has been indisputably proved—that he is a member and officer of petitioner—is another. In the one case there is "a real danger of legal detriment arising from the disclosure" (Rogers v. United States, supra, 340 U. S. at 373); in the other, there is nothing of the sort.

b. In evaluating the merit or lack of merit of a claim of privilege which an officer of petitioner might hereafter advance, one of the fundamental principles is that the privilege in question is a privilege against self-incrimination. The claimant may not, under the guise of protecting himself against self-incrimination, seek to shield oth[illegible]. Rogers v. United States, supra, 340 U. S. 367, 371; United States v. Murdock, 284 U. S. 141, 148; Hale v. Henkel, 201 U. S. 43, 69; Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 609. Relevant to the issue of the bona fides of the claim of privilege against self-incrimination, in addition to the considerations already mentioned, would be the fact that, under the terms of the Act, neither the holding of office nor membership in any Communist organization by any person shall constitute per se a violation of any criminal statute, and the further fact that the registration of any person under the Act as an officer or member of any Communist organization may not be received in evidence against such person in any prosecution for any alleged violation of any criminal statute (§ 4 (f)). While the latter provision is a limited and not an absolute grant of immunity against prosecution (cf. Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, with Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, and United States v. Ullman, 221 F. 2d 760 (C. A. 2), pending on writ of certiorari, No. 58, this Term), it is nevertheless a pertinent factor to be considered in evaluating the merit or lack of merit of a claim of privilege, that is to say, the verity of the claimed fear of self-incrimination.

c. Another reason why it should not be assumed that a claim of privilege will inevitably be made and honored is to be found in the prior history of this very case. In 1951, following the Attorney General's filing with the Board of his petition for an order directing registration, petitioner sought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia to enjoin the Attorney General from proceeding further. The requested injunction was denied by a statutory three-judge court. Communist Party of the United States v. McGrath, 96 F. Supp. 47, stay denied, 340 U. S. 950. Judge Bazelon, who dissented below, was one of the members of the three-judge court. As pointed out by Judge Bazelon in his concurring opinion in the injunction proceeding (96 F. Supp. at 50), and as he recalled in his dissent below (Op. 86, R. 2163, n. 39), one of the grounds urged by petitioner for enjoining hearings before the Board was that its defense before the Board required the filing of an answer and the giving of testimony by its officers and that, since "such testimony would necessarily entail their admission of Communist Party affiliations" (Op. 86, R. 2163, n. 39), such officers "will not appear for fear of self-incrimination or, if subpoenaed, will invoke their privilege and, as a result the Party's defense will necessarily fail" (96 F. Supp. at 50). Notwithstanding these representations, after the dismissal of its suit to enjoin the proceedings (from which dismissal it did not appeal), officials of petitioner did appear and testify at the Board hearings (see R. 136 [2049]).

This instance shows that the making of a future claim of privilege is never "inevitable," however likely it may seem or be represented to be. Two of petitioner's three witnesses before the Board, John Gates and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, voluntarily admitted on the witness stand that they were members of petitioner's governing body, the National Committee of the Communist Party (R. 1199, 1275). As such, assuming they still hold those offices, they will be among the persons having the duty to effect the registration of petitioner when the order directing such registration becomes final (28 C. F. R. § 11.205 (d); see fn. 28, supra, p. 106). If either should hereafter invoke the privilege against self-incrimination as justification for refusing to register petitioner, it would become an important point of inquiry, in determining the validity of such claim, whether it was made in good faith and whether it should not be rejected on the ground that they had waived their privilege by having taken the stand and voluntarily admitted their membership and high official positions in petitioner. Cf.

d. It is not our purpose here to explore all the ramifications of the question of the possible privilege of an official to refuse to effect petitioner's registration of petitioner on the ground that to do so would tend to incriminate him. On the contrary, our position is, as we have stated, that this question is not in this case at this time and has been prematurely raised by petitioner. Our purpose has been rather to refute the Party's contention that (1) the claim is certain to be made eventually, and that (2) when made it must certainly be upheld, so that (3) it should in the interest of economy be settled in this case, (4) in favor of upholding the claim. We submit that it is clear from what has been said that the premises of this argument are untenable; it cannot justifiably be assumed in this case either that a claim of privilege is certain to be made as soon as the order becomes final, or that, if and when made, it will present a plain and simple issue which must be resolved in favor of the claimant.

(ii) Even assuming that a claim of privilege will be made and must be honored, this would make the order to register at most unenforceable, not void

Even if it be assumed, moreover, that a claim of privilege will be made by each and every one of the officials of petitioner having the duty of effecting petitioner's registration (see (fn. 28, supra, p. 106), and that such a claim must of necessity be upheld, this would not render either the registration provisions of the Act or the order of the Board invalid. The order to register should still be upheld in this proceeding. "[T]he utmost result," as the court below observed, "would be that the statute and order would be unenforceable" (Op. 23, R. 2100). The distinction is important for at least three reasons. First, the non-enforceability of the order to register would not affect the "sanctions" or disabilities which come into being when the order to register becomes final; these have a vitality separate and apart from the registration process and do not depend upon actual registration (see supra, pp. 79–84). Secondly, the non-enforceability of the order could be removed by a grant of immunity from prosecution for any offense of which a prospective registerer of petitioner might fear to incriminate himself. See Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591; United States v. Ullman, 221 F. 2d 760 (C. A. 2), pending on writ of certiorari, No. 58, this Term.[30] Thirdly, an important public

[30] It is probable that such a grant of immunity would require a new statute. The court below suggested the possibility that immunity might be granted under 18 U. S. C. § 3486 (c), one of the immunity provisions created by the Act of August 20, 1954, c. 769, § 1, 68 Stat. 745 (see Op. 22–23, R. 2099–2100). It is true, as the court observed, that "[u]nder that statute the courts have broad powers to grant function is served by the Board's finding that the petitioner is a Communist-action organization and should register, regardless of whether the registration can actually be effectuated; Congress desired to have the facts sifted and established by quasi-judicial proceedings and then made known to the public (supra, pp. 88, 98–100).[30a]

Petitioner's (Br. 88) and the dissenting judge's (Op. 84–85, R. 2161–2162) reliance on Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, as authority for their view that the Act should be declared invalid as violative of the self-incrimination clause even in the absence of a claim of privilege, is misplaced. That decision invalidated a statute which presented to a suspected violator of the immunity, upon application of the Attorney General, in proceedings before them involving violations of the statute here involved" (Op. 22, R. 2099). However, the immunity statute in question is limited by its terms to cases or proceedings "before any grand jury or court of the United States" involving the national security. This would seem to exclude the possibility of granting immunity in connection with the process of registering organizations with the Attorney General. However, the fact that new legislation would probably be required to authorize the granting of immunity in connection with registration proceedings does not affect our argument that, because of the possibility of granting immunity, the order is not invalid merely because it might not be enforceable without such a grant.

[30a] It should be recalled that organizations found, after hearing, to be "Communist-infiltrated" are not required to register (supra, pp. 86–87); as to these organizations, Congress was content with the Board's order and findings.

revenue laws the alternative of either (1) producing his private books and records in refutation of charges alleged by the Government to be based on what those books and records would show or (2) suffering the charges to be taken as confessed.[31] The statute did not contemplate that the suspected violator could be excused from producing his books and records by a claim of the privilege against self-incrimination.

In the context of such a statute, a claim of privilege would have been quite meaningless. For this reason it is not surprising that nowhere in this Court's opinion is there any discussion of the necessity that the privilege against self-incrimination be specifically claimed as a prerequisite [31] The statute provided in pertinent part as follows: "In all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the government, whenever in his belief any business book, invoice, or paper belonging to, or under the control of, the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court * * * may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court * * *; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail or refuse to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed, unless his failure or refusal to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. * * *" (116 U. S. at 619–620).

to its judicial consideration—the feature of self-incrimination cases so prominently mentioned in all the later cases (see supra, p. 103). The statute was held void as necessarily conflicting with the privilege. In the case at bar, on the other hand, there is no reason to believe that a valid claim of privilege will or must be rejected, and certainly the Act, unlike the statute in Boyd, does not deny the privilege to a person who could validly claim it. In other words, the Boyd statute flatly denied the privilege to one who could properly claim it and wished to do so; the Act involved here does no such thing.

Furthermore, as was pointed out by the court below (Op. 23–24, R. 2100–2101), the Boyd case dealt with personal, private papers—a fact on which the Boyd opinion laid great emphasis (116 U. S. at 622, 623, 624, 630, 633, etc.) and which was, as the court below said, "a key to the decision" (Op. 23, R. 2100). In all the later cases in which Boyd is discussed, this Court has emphasized that feature of the case. See, e. g., Wilson v. United States, 221 U. S. 361, 377; Essgee Co. v. United States, 262 U. S. 151, 158; Nathanson v. United States, 290 U. S. 41, 47; United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694, 699; Shapiro v. United States, 335 U. S. 1, 33. Here, on the other hand, as we shall stress (see infra, pp. 117–121), the books and records which would reflect the data to be included in the registration statement are not personal but organizational records—the distinction which forms the very basis of this Court's White decision, 322 U. S. 694 (see supra, p. 102; infra, pp. 117–121).

(b) In any event, the officers of petitioner having the duty under the Act and regulations to effect the registration will not be personally privileged to refuse to do so

If the Court should reject our argument that it need not and should not now pass upon the issue of whether an officer of the Party can validly claim the privilege as a ground for not registering the Party, and should desire to determine that issue in this proceeding, our position would be that the privilege is not available to such officers. In United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694, the Court held not merely that an organization or association cannot invoke the privilege against self-incrimination, but that an officer of an organization or association who has custody of its records, if called upon to produce them pursuant to a subpoena, may not lawfully refuse to do so even if they would tend to incriminate him personally. "[T]he papers and effects which the privilege protects," this Court said, "must be the private property of the person claiming the privilege, or at least in his possession in a purely personal capacity. * * * But individuals, when acting as representatives of a collective group, cannot be said to be exercising their personal rights and duties nor to be entitled to their purely personal privileges. Rather they assume the rights, duties and privileges of the artificial entity or association of which they are agents or officers and they are bound by its obligations. In their official capacity, therefore, they have no privilege against self-incrimination. And the official records and documents of the organization that are held by them in a representative rather than in a personal capacity cannot be the subject of the personal privilege against self-incrimination, even though production of the papers might tend to incriminate them personally" (322 U. S. at 699).

The rationale of the White case is equally applicable, we submit, to the case at bar. Cf. Meltzer, Required Records, The McCarran Act, and the Privilege Against Self-Incrimination, 18 Univ. of Chi. L. Rev. 687, 720. This Court has, in fact, specifically cited the White case as authority for the proposition that one of this very petitioner's officers on the local level—the Treasurer of the Communist Party of Denver—"had no privilege with respect to the books of the Party, whether it be a corporation or an unincorporated association." Rogers v. United States, 340 U. S. 367, 371–372.

Nor is the rationale of White inapplicable on the ground that in White physical records were in question, while the issue here is the compulsory submission of a registration statement containing the names and addresses of officers and members of petitioner and an accounting of moneys received and expended. For, as the court below said, the data required to be contained in the registration statement "are reproductions of or extracts from organization records" (Op. 17, R. 2094). If the officer of petitioner having custody of its records, showing the names and addresses of its officers and members and the sources and modes of expenditure of its funds, may be required to submit those records pursuant to a subpoena duces tecum, notwithstanding his claim that they tend to incriminate him personally, it would be an exaltation of form over substance to hold that he may not be required to transpose such data to a registration form to be filed as required by the Act. Whether the records reflecting the required data "are kept formally or informally is immaterial," as the court below observed, since "[n]o additional explanatory testimony is required by this statute" (Op. 18, R. 2095). Indeed, there is authority for the view that, to a limited extent, in cases where the compellability of the production of records is established, oral testimony "auxiliary to the production" may also be compelled. United States v. Field, 193 F. 2d 92, 97 (C. A. 2), petition for certiorari dismissed, 342 U. S. 908; Pulford v. United States, 155 F. 2d 944, 947 (C. A. 6). For example, an officer who has been compelled to produce documents which incriminate him may also be required to testify as to their genuineness (United States v. Austin-Bagley Corporation, 31 F. 2d 229, 234 (C. A. 2), certiorari denied, 279 U. S. 863; United States v. Daisart Sportswear, 169 F. 2d 856, 861–862 (C. A. 2), reversed on other grounds sub nom. Smith v. United States, 337 U. S. 137) or to explain incomplete, illegible, or abbreviated entries. Fleming v. Silverman, 7 F. R. D. 29, 31 (N. D. Ill.). Cf. Porter v. Heend, 6 F. R. D. 588, 589–590 (N. D. Ill.).

Judge Bazelon, dissenting below, attempted to distinguish the White case on the ground, among others, that the officer executing a registration statement is required to do more than produce records of the organization he is registering; that is, he is required to prepare a statement containing data which may or may not be entirely contained in the organization's records (Op. 82–83, R. 2159–2160). To the extent that any required data might not be reflected in the records, he pointed out, the officer is required to rely on his own personal knowledge, and if he has to rely on his own personal knowledge, the information he supplies is to that extent "forced from [his] lips * * *, rather than obtained from the records" (Op. 83, R. 2160). But the argument that, because some of the information called for in a statement required to be filed may be privileged, no statement at all need be filed, has been specifically rejected by this Court. See United States

v. Sullivan, 274 U. S. 259, holding that the fact that some of the answers called for on an income tax return form may be incriminating does not excuse a failure to file any return at all, the proper course being to file a return and claim the privilege, where the facts warrant, with respect to specific questions. Similarly with respect to a registration statement, even if it be assumed that the registering officer has a privilege with respect to called-for data not found in the organization's records, he would be required to file as complete a statement as possible based on the records, and claim his privilege with respect to the rest.[32]

(c) The validity of the personal registration requirements of Section 8 is not in issue since no individual member of petitioner has been required to register and none is before the Court

The court below was obviously correct in holding that the validity of the personal registration requirements of § 8 of the Act is not presented in this case (Op. 24–25, R. 2101–2102). As already noted, that section provides, first, that individual members of Communist-action organizations must register personally as members if their organization has been finally ordered to register and fails to do so (§ 8 (a)), and, secondly, that if a Communist-action organization registers but fails to include the names of all its members on the membership list it files, the members whose names are omitted must register themselves as members (§ 8 (b)). See supra, pp. 76–77. Section 8 is thus "an alternate, rather than an attachment, to the registration of the organization. As such it poses a separate and independent problem from that posed by the requirement for organization registration. To reach the problem posed under Section 8 we would have to assume that the Party will not register if it is finally ordered to do so, or that if it registers its membership list will be incomplete. But we cannot make such assumptions" (Op. 25, R. 2102). Self-incrimination questions pertaining to the personal registration requirements of § 8 are thus even more premature than those pertaining to the organizational registration requirements of § 7. They are hypothetical questions which may never arise in justiciable form. The Act, moreover, contemplates the institution of proceedings before the Board, culminating in an order, subject to full judicial review, directed to an individual and ordering him to register, as the exclusive means of enforcing § 8 (see §§ 13 (a), (c), (d), (g) (2), 14 (a), (b), 15 (a) (2); and see supra, pp. 76–77, 79). For these reasons, the personal registration provisions of § 8 are plainly not before the Court. Electric Bond & Share Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 303 U. S. 419, 443.

[32] Thus, for example, if the filing official were known by more than one name and he feared that the listing of his aliases would tend to be self-incriminatory for some reason (see Op. 24, R. 2101), he could indicate in the registration statement that he was claiming his privilege with respect to his own aliases, though, as the court below indicated (ibid.), he could not do so with respect to the aliases of others.

3. The registration provisions are in accord with due process

Petitioner challenges the registration provisions of the Act as violative of due process in a number of respects (Br. 41–60, 64–82), none of which, we submit, has merit.

(a) The Act does not predetermine petitioner's liability to registration so as to render the proceedings before the Board a formality

Petitioner first urges (Br. 41–45, 56–60) that the Act violates due process because it "predetermines" (Br. 42, 43, 45, 57, 59), by "legislative fiat" (Br. 43, 45, 59), a decision by the Board requiring it to register. The Act contains, it is charged, a "built-in finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization" (Pet. 50; Br. 26), and the quasi-judicial proceeding before the Board was therefore a mere formality. Petitioner's argument, however, is founded on an unwarranted oversimplification of the Act's terms. It seeks to ignore, or unjustifiably to discount the importance of, crucial language in the § 3 (3) definition of a "Communist-action" organization.

(i) Under the definition of § 3 (3), a domestic organization which is not "substantially directed, dominated, or controlled" by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement, or which does not "operate primarily to advance the objectives" of that movement, is not a "Communist-action organization" and is not subject to the registration and other provisions of the Act, regardless of how "communistic" its philosophy might be, or how deep might be its bonds of sympathy and kinship with the foreign government or organization. Both conditions, it is to be observed, must be fulfilled for the definition to apply. Either alone is insufficient.

It is therefore entirely without warrant to assert, as petitioner does, that the Board had no real function to perform so far as petitioner was concerned, or that it was, and was meant by Congress to be, no more than a "rubber-stamp" designed to place a predetermined label on petitioner. See Communist Party of the United States v. McGrath, 96 F. Supp. 47, 50 (Judge Bazelon concurring). That Congress may have confidently believed, on the basis of evidence adduced at congressional hearings, that petitioner would fall within the definition of § 3 (3) is of no moment so far as the requirements of due process are concerned. Congress supposes in the case of many of the statutes it passes that specific organizations or persons will be subject to their terms. As the court below observed, "A statute is not necessarily null merely because it fits a known person. Many valid statutes do" (Op. 40, R. 2117).

The important point is that Congress required proof of the two fundamental operative facts, referred to above, by a preponderance of the evidence in proceedings before the Board, and made the Board's findings subject to judicial review, before the obligation to register or any other requirement of the Act could become effective. The congressional findings as to the existence of a world and an American Communist movement do not make the Act operative against petitioner. Further crucial findings were required to be made, on proof, before that could occur, viz, that petitioner is substantially dominated and controlled by the foreign government or organization controlling the world Communist movement and is operating primarily to advance the objectives of that movement.

The decisions cited by petitioner (Br. 56–57), of which Tot v. United States, 319 U. S. 463, is representative, do not aid petitioner's argument. These cases concern the validity of statutory presumptions under the due process clause. They hold that, in the language of Tot, "a statutory presumption cannot be sustained if there be no rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed, if the inference of the one from proof of the other is arbitrary, because of lack of connection between the two in common experience" (319 U. S. at 467–468). But, as we have just pointed out and as observed by the court below (Op. 43, R. 2120), the Subversive Activities Control Act creates no statutory presumptions in this connection. Rather, the Act provides freely for trial of the two issues, stated above, which were left to the Board. We point out below (infra, pp. 132–150) that the eight factors listed in § 13 (e) do not constitute statutory "presumptions."

(ii) Furthermore, due process does not require, as petitioner contends, that the legislative findings of § 2 be the subject of redetermination in a "free adjudication of the facts" in the quasi-judicial proceedings before the Board (Pet. 48; Br. 57–59). This argument confuses two sets of facts—the legislative facts, or those facts which have been found by the legislature itself after investigation to exist and to require the legislative action taken, and the adjudicative facts which, on proof in adversary litigation, bring a specific person or organization within the purview of the legislation, or otherwise make the general terms of the legislation specifically applicable. See McCormick, Judicial Notice, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 296, 315–318; Davis, Official Notice, 62 Harv. L. Rev. 537, 549–560.

Legislative facts are general conclusions which support the policy of a particular law, and can be attacked only by showing that Congress acted arbitrarily or unreasonably or beyond its delegated powers. Alabama State Federation of Labor v. McAdory, 325 U. S. 450, 465–466; United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U. S. 144, 152–153. The facts on which the legislature acted can frequently be the subject of judicial notice; in other cases the courts may make inquiry to determine whether there is a reasonable basis for the legislative action. United States v. Carolene Products Co., supra, 304 U. S. at 153; Borden's Farm Products Co. v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 194, 209–210; Chastleton Corp. v. Sinclair, 264 U. S. 543, 547–548; see McCormick, Judicial Notice, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 296, 316–317. But, at most, the inquiry is as to whether the legislature has acted reasonably.

Here, Congress recorded in § 2 the basis for its action, the threat to the United States presented by the Communist movement. The existence of that threat and of that movement are recognized facts of modern history. See supra, pp. 44–61. Congress cannot be accused of irrationality in taking account of them. Cf. Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 535–536. Due process in adversary proceedings, whether before courts or quasi-judicial bodies like the Board, does not require formal proof of these basic facts of which Congress took official notice. The existence of the Communist movement and the fact that it is a threat to this nation's security are, therefore, no more subject to litigation in a particular proceeding under the Act than would be, for example, the fact that much of the world was at war between 1941 and 1945 or that the nation and the world were suffering from severe economic dislocations in the early 1930's.[33] Cf. McCormick, Judicial Notice, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 296, 313, 315–318. In short, these legisla-

[33] The latter example suggests a hypothetical analogy to the statute at bar. Suppose that Congress, during the depression of the '30's, passed an act which found as a fact, among other things, that there existed a world-wide economic depression, having certain described characteristics, which was severely affecting the nation's economy. Suppose further that the act established a regulatory agency with the power, under the guidance of appropriate standards, to prohibit or control certain types of business activity which were found on the basis of evidence to have a substantial tendency to deepen the world and national economic crisis by further depressing interstate and foreign commerce. Could a person or company liable to be affected by an order of such an agency demand the right to seek to prove before it that there was no world-wide economic depression of the type described in the congressional findings? Or that, if there was, it was not affecting the domestic economy in the manner found by Congress? We submit that there is nothing in any valid concept of due process which could properly be construed to require that every person or company involved in a proceeding before such an agency be granted a hearing in which to attempt to convince it that these basic legislative findings of Congress were erroneous. This is so, we maintain, notwithstanding that the adjudicative findings of the agency would assume the facts incorporated in the legislative findings in precisely the same sense in which the adjudicative findings of the Board in this case assume the facts stated in the legislative findings of § 2 of the Act at bar.

tive findings in § 2 are "[t]he reasons for the exercise of power" by Congress. Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 535. And as this Court said with respect to these very findings, in Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, 529:

> On the basis of extensive investigation Congress made many findings, including that in § 2 (1) of the [Subversive Activities Control] Act that the "Communist movement * * * is a world-wide revolutionary movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship," and made present or former membership in the Communist Party, in and of itself, a ground for deportation. Certainly, we cannot say that this classification by Congress is so baseless as to be violative of due process and therefore beyond the power of Congress.

(iii) The fact that § 4 of the Communist Control Act of 1954 (see Pet. Br. 268–269) refers to petitioner by name as a "Communist-action" organization under the Subversive Activities Control Act (see Pet. Br. 59–60) does not aid petitioner's basic contention on this point. Since the Communist Control Act was passed long after the termination of these proceedings before the Board, it is evident that that Act's designation of petitioner by name could not have influenced the Board's deliberations or otherwise affected the administrative proceedings. At most, it amounted to congressional approval of and concurrence in the Board's decision. And that decision, as we have pointed out (supra, pp. 123–126), was required to be based upon judicially reviewable proof that petitioner came within the § 3 (3) definition of a Communist-action organization.

(b) The Act does not establish a Board which is "necessarily biased" against petitioner

Related to the previous contention is petitioner's further argument (Br. 53–56, 70–71) that "the Act violates due process by establishing a Board which is necessarily biased and has an interest in the event" (Br. 70) because to sustain its raison d'etre it would have to find the Communist Party within the Act. What petitioner in effect is charging is that the structure and scheme of the Act are such that it would be impossible to staff the Board with members who would not enter upon their duties with the intention of violating their oaths of office. This Court has refused to impute, on the theory of constructive bias, a dishonest or interested point of view to government employees sitting as jurors in cases to which the Government is a party (Frazier v. United States, 335 U. S. 497; United States v. Wood, 299 U. S. 123), including criminal prosecutions of admitted Communists of high position. Dennis v. United States, 339 U. S. 162. There is no more reason to believe members of the Board would violate their oaths in a proceeding under this Act by determining to find petitioner registerable as a Communist-action organization, irrespective of the Act's definition of the term and regardless of what the evidence might show. This Court has said, "We cannot agree that courts should assume in advance that an administrative hearing may not be fairly conducted." Fahey v. Mallonee, 332 U. S. 245, 256; see also Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 700–703; National Labor Relations Board v. Air Associates, 121 F. 2d 586 (C. A. 2). This is especially true where full opportunity for judicial review is afforded by the Act (see Fahey v. Mallonee, supra, 332 U. S. at 256; Marquette Cement Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 147 F. 2d 589, 594 (C. A. 7)), and even more particularly where, as here, the standard of review is the strict "preponderance of the evidence" standard (see Op. 49, R. 2126). A full and fair hearing was in fact afforded in this case, and the Board's findings (in the main) and conclusions were upheld by the Court of Appeals as sustained by the preponderance of the evidence. The court below is surely not subject to the charges made against the Board.

(c) The Act does not authorize a determination that an organization is a Communist-action organization on the basis of irrational or vague criteria or presumptions

Petitioner next contends (Br. 46–53, 64–69; Pet. 16–18, 51–54) that the Act "violates due process because it authorizes a determination that an organization is a Communist-action organization on the basis of irrational and vague criteria" (Pet. 51). The "criteria" referred to are the eight evidentiary matters or factors listed in § 13 (e), which the Act requires the Board to "take into consideration" in "determining whether any organization is a 'Communist-action organization'." Supra, p. 74.

(i) At the heart of petitioner's contention, vitiating it in all its ramifications, is its fundamentally erroneous view (see Br. 46, 47, 48, 50, 51, 64, 68) that the eight factors itemized in § 13 (e) are tests or individual criteria of whether a given organization is a Communist-action organization. Petitioner assumes that under § 13 (e) the Board has been authorized by Congress to find that an organization is a Communist-action organization if it meets any one of the eight "tests" listed in that subsection. This assumption, however, is clearly erroneous, and the error is basic. Congress provided no such collection of litmus tests as petitioner supposes. The items listed in § 13 (e) are simply relevant considerations or guides to the consideration of evidence bearing upon the question of whether an organization is a Communist-action organization. The sole and exclusive "test", which petitioner concedes to be "definite and meaningful" (Br. 53), is that supplied by the definition of such an organization in § 3 (3), viz, whether it is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or organization controlling the world Communist movement and operates primarily to advance the objectives of that movement as referred to in § 2.

As the court below aptly phrased it (Op. 43, R. 2120), § 13 (e) is merely a "catalog of some basic considerations" bearing on that ultimate issue, and the listed items are in no sense exclusive. "Nothing in the statute hints at an exclusive criterion. The Board should, and so far as we can tell did, admit and consider whatever is competent, relevant and material" (Op. 42, R. 2119).[34] On the other hand, if petitioner were right in its reading of the items in § 13 (e), the definition in § 3 (3) would serve no purpose at all.

[34] In this respect, the Act is comparable to many other federal statutes which set forth guides to administrators, guides which are not separate "tests" but factors to be considered. See, e. g., Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394; Mulford v. Smith, 307 U. S. 38; Sunshine Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U. S. 381; Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrator, 312 U. S. 126; Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414; American Power Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 329 U. S. 90; Fahey v. Mallonee, 332 U. S. 245; Lichter v. United States, 334 U. S. 742. See also infra, pp. 150–154.

(ii) When the function to be served by the § 13 (e) evidentiary factors is properly understood, they are not, as petitioner contends, "irrational" (Br. 46, 64). On the contrary, they are all both rational and probative. While we believe this to be evident from a mere reading of the items, we shall take them up seriatim and examine each in the light of the particular criticism leveled by petitioner. But in the course of this necessarily painstaking analysis we should not like the Court to forget that petitioner, by hacking away at the individual trees and ignoring the forest, has reached the astounding conclusion that it is impossible rationally to conclude that the Communist Party of the United States is the pawn of the Soviet Union and exists to further the objectives of the world Communist movement. In the guise of an elaborate textual argument, petitioner is simply denying that reasonable men can characterize it as has been done many times by all three branches of our government, by countless scholars throughout the world, by a multitude of foreign states, and by most of the press of the free nations.

The "directives and policies" consideration (§ 13 (e) (1)).—Section 13 (e) (1) requires the Board to take into consideration—

> (1) the extent to which its [the organization's] policies are formulated and carried out and its activities performed, pursuant > to directives or to effectuate the policies of the foreign government or foreign organization in which is vested, or under the domination or control of which is exercised, the direction and control of the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 * * *.

This goes directly to the nature of the relationship existing between the organization and the foreign government or organization controlling the world Communist movement, which is the primary focus of the Act. Petitioner contends, however, that it is irrational on two counts.

First, it says, § 13 (e) (1) does not require the Board to consider whether the organization seeks to effectuate "the seditious objectives ascribed to the world Communist movement and the Soviet Union by section 2", but only whether it seeks to effectuate "any policies of the Soviet Union, irrespective of their content" (Br. 47, including fn. 19). Accordingly, says petitioner, the Board is authorized by § 13 (e) (1) to find that the domestic organization is a Communist-action organization "from the fact that the alleged agent advances objectives which are not peculiar to the alleged principal, but which may be shared by, and may benefit, non-Communist individuals and governments, including our own" (Br. 47).

This argument distorts the language of § 13 (e) (1). Section 13 (e) (1) does not say that the Board is to consider the extent to which the organization's policies are formulated and carried out, and its activities performed, to effectuate "any" policies of the foreign government which controls the world Communist movement. The word used is "the," which refers to the policies of the foreign government as a whole. These would certainly include at least those major objectives referred to in § 2 as presenting a clear and present danger to the security of the United States, i. e., the establishment of Communist totalitarian dictatorships in the countries throughout the world and the forcible overthrow of this Government (see, particularly, § 2 (1) and (15)), as well as any "good" objectives—objectives which might "be shared by" and "benefit" the United States—which could incidentally, as tactical or intermediate ends, accompany the major goals. As the court below remarked (Op. 44, R. 2121)—

> The crucial factor in the statute before us is the aim, spelled out in detail, of the world Communist movement to disestablish our system of government. Our Government may well oppose the establishment in this country of a totalitarian dictatorship of the sort described in the definition, even if such a dictatorship does not meet the definition of "evil" [i. e., having "immediate objectives" which are "morally wrong" (see ibid.)] or even if it has many beneficent features

Thus, contrary to petitioner's claim (Br. 68), § 13 (e) (1), fairly read, does direct the Board to consider evidence that the accused organization is engaged in promoting the disestablishment of our system of government. Furthermore, as we have pointed out (supra, pp. 123-125), the Board must in any event be satisfied from all the evidence that the organization before it, besides being controlled by the foreign government or organization controlling the world Communist movement, operates primarily to advance the objectives of that movement "as referred to in section 2." The objectives of the world Communist movement "as referred to in section 2" are precisely those objectives which petitioner contends, erroneously, are not required to be considered.[35]

[35] Throughout its brief, petitioner repeats a statement to the effect that the court below held that "while section 3 (3) defines a Communist-action organization as one which promotes the seditious objectives attributed to the world Communist movement by section 2, section 13 (e) authorizes the Board to issue a registration order without any proof whatsoever that the accused organization promotes these objectives" (Br. 66; see also Br. 46, 47, 99, 101, 109, 113 [fn. 56], 115). The pages of the court's opinion which petitioner cites for this statement—Op. 41, 44, 45, R. 2118, 2121, 2122 (see Br. 46)—do not bear it out. What the court said was that the objectives referred to in § 13 (e) (1) "need not necessarily be 'evil' in [the] sense" of "immediate objectives which are morally wrong" (Op. 44, R. 2121, emphasis supplied)—which was what the court assumed petitioner meant by the word "evil" in the argument the court was then considering. The court did not say and could not have meant

Secondly, says petitioner, under the § 3 (3) definition "the two elements of a Communist-action organization"—foreign control and the fact that the organization operates primarily to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement—are stated "in the conjunctive", but § 13 (e) (1) refers to these elements "in the disjunctive. * * * This is plainly irrational" (Br. 47). Here, again, petitioner mistakes the function of § 13 (e) (1) as an alternative definition of a Communist-action organization. We have pointed out (supra, pp. 123–125) that only § 3 (3) contains the definition of such an organization. It alone controls the ultimate finding as to registerability. But this does not detract from the significance of § 13 (e) (1), which refers to evidentiary considto imply that the Board would be authorized under the Act to find a domestic group a Communist-action organization without any proof that it promotes the objectives attributed to the world Communist movement by § 2. This is clear from its statement, among others, that "[o]ur Government may well oppose the establishment in this country of a totalitarian dictatorship of the sort described in the definition, even if such dictatorship does not meet the definition of 'evil' * * *" (ibid.)—i. e., "evil" in the sense in which the court had just previously used the term.

Since the § 3 (3) definition requires a finding that an organization, to be a Communist-action organization, operates primarily to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement "as referred to in section 2", the evidence must establish that fact to support such a finding, but whether those objectives be deemed by any particular individual to be "good" or "evil" in the "moral sense" is not controlling.

erations having a direct bearing upon that issue and which are thus possessed of probative force.

The "non-deviation" consideration (§ 13 (e) (2)).—Section 13 (e) (2) requires the Board to take into consideration—

> (2) the extent to which its [the organization's] views and policies do not deviate from those of such foreign government or foreign organization [i. e., the foreign government or organization which controls the world Communist movement].

The court below not only held that the "non-deviation" inquiry is a proper one to be made in determining the question of foreign control, but observed that it would be "difficult to conceive of a more proper" one (Op. 44, R. 2121). "In an inquiry as to the domination of one organization by another," said the court, "the extent of the deviation one from the other in views and policies is both relevant and material; indeed it would be one of the necessary considerations" (ibid.). Non-deviation, in short, may not be conclusive, but it is plainly relevant.

Petitioner mistakes the meaning and purpose of this factor when it contends that "[u]nder this obscurantist text, the stigma of foreign control and sedition can be avoided only by adopting views which are demonstrably false if the Soviet Union has adopted views which are demonstrably true" (Br. 48). The fact that a local organization mirrors in each facet of its activities through the years the policies of a foreign state is surely pertinent to proof of its control by that state. See Sutherland, Freedom and Internal Security (1951), 64 Harv. L. Rev. 383, 401. That B undeviatingly reflects A's every act does not, of itself, prove that A controls B; the possibility remains that B controls A, or that each is controlled by C, or that it is simply a matter of extraordinary coincidence. But the fact is certainly relevant to the inquiry. Cf. North American Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 327 U. S. 686, 692, where this Court observed that, in determining whether one company was subject to the controlling influence of another, the Securities and Exchange Commission was "warranted in considering the harmonization of local policies."

The "financial aid" consideration (§ 13 (e) (3)).—Section 13 (e) (3) requires the Board to take into consideration—

> (3) the extent to which it [the organization] receives financial or other aid, directly or indirectly, from or at the direction of such foreign government or foreign organization [i. e., the foreign government or organization which controls the world Communist movement].

Petitioner attacks this evidentiary factor on the ground that foreign financial aid to a local organization does not, in and of itself, prove domination and control (Br. 49, emphasis added). Of course it does not. But foreign financial support is a pertinent factor which may reasonably be considered with other evidence as tending to show control by the foreign donor. In the ordinary course of events a foreign power does not contribute funds to a local organization as a bare gratuity, without expectation of some benefit.

Petitioner argues that in such cases "the relevant consideration is not the bare fact of aid, but the terms and conditions, if any, on which it is given" (ibid.). But as observed by the court below, while "the terms of a contribution are more, even much more, material to the issue of intended influence by means of the gift," nevertheless "the bare fact of the gift is not irrelevant" (Op. 46, R. 2123). While "it may be explained away, as may any of the statutory specifications of considerations" listed in § 13 (e), "the fact of the gift is certainly an admissible item of proof" (ibid.).

The "instruction and training" consideration (§ 13 (e) (4)).—Section 13 (e) (4) requires the Board to take into consideration—

> (4) the extent to which it [the organization] sends members or representatives to any foreign country for instruction or training in the principles, policies, strategy, or tactics of such world Communist movement.

Petitioner's attack on this "test" (Br. 49–50) is another instance of its erroneous treatment of each paragraph under § 13 (e) as supplying a criterion which may, in and of itself, be ultimate. But viewed as a factor to be weighed, this consideration is surely pertinent. True, the sending of one representative to one foreign conference might have little or no meaning. On the other hand, a local organization's continuous course of regularly sending representatives for specialized training in the strategy and tactics of world Communism, which is subsequently used for carrying out directions in this country, could be highly significant. Petitioner nevertheless contends that this factor "is irrational because it does not require a showing that the accused organization is obliged to or does conform to what is taught" (Br. 50). However, as remarked by the court below, the question at this point is not whether the Board could legitimately "make an ultimate finding of foreign domination upon the basis of bare evidence that [petitioner] sent agents abroad" (Op. 46, R. 2123), but the propriety of considering such evidence as part of a total picture.

The "reporting" consideration (§ 13 (e) (5)).—Section 13 (e) (5) requires the Board to take into consideration—

> (5) the extent to which it [the organization] reports to such foreign government or foreign organization [i. e., the foreign government or organization which controls the world Communist movement] or to its representatives.

Here, too, it is the context in which the reporting is done—the entire factual background against which the reporting occurs—which gives meaning and significance to the act of making reports. A report may be made, as petitioner says (Br. 50), under circumstances which suggest nothing in the way of control or domination. On the other hand, such surrounding circumstances as the length of time the reporting goes on, the frequency of its occurrence, the conditions of secrecy under which it is carried out, the contents of the reports, the reasons therefor, and all the other background data might very well indicate a definite degree of domination and control, or even that the reporting party is an agent of the party reported to. The fact of reporting is consequently a legitimate evidentiary item whose significance is to be appraised in the light of the evidence as a whole.

The "discipline" consideration (§ 13 (e)(6)).—Section 13 (e)(6) requires the Board to take into consideration—

> (6) the extent to which its [the organization's] principal leaders or a substantial number of its members are subject to or recognize the disciplinary power of such foreign government or foreign organization [i. e., the foreign government or organization which controls the world Communist movement] or its representatives.

If, as in the hypothetical case petitioner poses (Br. 50), the evidence should show that only a relatively few of the organization's leaders or an unimportant minority of its members are subject to foreign disciplinary power, that fact would, of course, tend to discount the significance of this factor in the total picture which emerges from the evidence as a whole. But the possibility of that result does not negate the propriety of the inquiry, which is into "the extent to which" the organization's leaders and members are under foreign discipline. As with all the other evidentiary matters contained in § 13 (e), it is the degree to which the particular evidential factor appertains that the Board is directed to consider. If the evidence is equivocal or insignificant with respect to a given item of inquiry, the record will so show. It cannot be assumed in advance that the Board will be governed by trivial evidence or evidence having no real probative force with respect to the ultimate issue, or that Congress so intended.

The "secret practices" consideration (§ 13 (e) (7)).—Section 13 (e) (7) requires the Board to take into consideration—

> (7) the extent to which, for the purpose of concealing foreign direction, domination, or control, or of expediting or promoting its objectives, (i) it [the organization] fails to disclose, or resists efforts to obtain information as to its membership (by keeping membership lists in code, by instructing members to refuse to acknowledge membership, or by any other method);

> (ii) its members refuse to acknowledge membership therein; (iii) it fails to disclose, or resists efforts to obtain information as to, records other than membership lists; (iv) its meetings are secret; and (v) it otherwise operates on a secret basis.

Petitioner contends that this "test" is irrational because it makes "secret practices" relevant (Br. 51)— > * * * only if employed for the purpose of concealing foreign control or promoting the organization's objectives. The first of these purpose limitations involves circular reasoning, since foreign control is one of the ultimate facts to be established under section 3 (3). Obviously, a standard whose application requires proof of an ultimate fact cannot be used to determine the existence of the ultimate fact. * * *

This argument, however, overlooks the fact that the "purpose" clause of § 13 (e) (7) is not limited to "for the purpose of concealing foreign direction, domination or control." It is cast in the disjunctive: "* * * or of expediting or promoting its [the organization's] objectives." Thus, so far as the language of § 13 (e) (7) is concerned, the purpose of the secret practices may not be directly concerned with "concealing foreign direction, domination, or control." Petitioner's contention that § 13 (e) (7) necessarily involves circular reasoning is therefore untenable.[36]

Once again we must stress—because petitioner pointedly ignores it—that this is but one of several factors to be taken into account and is not determinative in itself. An organization's habit of operating on a basis of secrecy, for either of the purposes referred to in § 13 (e) (7), is obviously a pertinent factor to be considered in determining whether it meets the § 3 (3) definition of a Communist-action organization, along with such evidence as the calculated avoidance of previous registration acts, past illegal activities of its leaders, and past domination and control by a foreign government. Cf. American Power Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 329 U. S. 90, 104.

[36] Petitioner also attempts to build a "circuity" argument on the second part of the "purpose" clause of § 13 (e) (7), viz, "for the purpose of * * * expediting or promoting its objectives." Relating this to the second element of the definition of a Communist-action organization—the requirement that the organization in question "operate primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement * * *" (see § 3 (3))—petitioner, in the same manner as it argued in the passage quoted in the text, supra, contends that the secrecy test cannot come into play until the ultimate fact that "secret practices" is supposed to establish has first been independently proved (Br. 51). This branch of petitioner's argument, however, is as invalid as the other, and for the same reason—that the two parts of the "purpose" clause of § 13 (e) (7) are in the disjunctive.

The "allegiance" consideration (§ 13 (e) (8)).—Section 13 (e) (8) requires the Board to take into consideration—

> (8) the extent to which its [the organization's] principal leaders or a substantial number of its members consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their obligations to such foreign government or foreign organization [i. e., the foreign government or organization which controls the world Communist movement].

Petitioner criticizes this "test" on several grounds (Br. 51–52). First, it says, it is "completely subjective. It directs an inquiry into a pure state of mind" (Br. 51). Of course, allegiance is ultimately a matter of mental attitude. But this is determinable from objective facts. Inquiry into states of mind—with what intent a person did something, for example—is a common legal function.

Secondly, says petitioner, the paragraph in question "assumes the facts prerequisite to the state of mind into which the Board is to inquire" (Br. 51). It does not, according to the argument, direct the Board to determine whether any of the organization's leaders or members owe obligations to the foreign government or organization but assumes that some leaders and members do owe such obligations and confines the Board's inquiry to whether they consider those obligations subordinate to their allegiance to the United States (Br. 51–52). This argument is little more than a quibble. It could as well be argued that the paragraph assumes—what might be contrary to the facts—that all of the leaders and members of the organization consider that they owe at least some degree of allegiance to the United States. Properly construed, the paragraph simply means that the Board should take into consideration the extent to which the organization's principal leaders or a substantial number of its members consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to such obligations as they may have or feel they have to the foreign government or organization which controls the world Communist movement.

Thirdly, petitioner urges that the paragraph "imputes to the organization the state of mind of its 'principal leaders or a substantial number of its members' although they may be an unrepresentative or dissenting minority and though the organization itself is completely loyal" (Br. 52). This criticism is equally unavailing. It is the same attack which petitioner makes against the "discipline" consideration of § 13 (e) (6) (see supra, pp. 143–144) and our reply to that criticism (supra, pp. 143–144) is also applicable here. The essential point, once again, is that this factor, like all the other factors listed in § 13 (e), presents a pertinent evidentiary consideration and is in no sense a controlling criterion.

The "allegiance" consideration, far from being irrational, is one of the most relevant and cogent factors. The character of an organization is always colored by the viewpoint of its leadership. When that viewpoint is shared by substantial segments of its other members, it may very well stamp the organization with an indelible character. If a significant number of the leaders and members of a certain group feel they owe a higher allegiance to a foreign country (or to an organization or movement controlled by that country) than to their own, that fact is incontestably one indication of the group's character. This factor becomes even more obviously relevant when applied to an autocratic organization dominated and inflexibly disciplined by a central ruling clique from the top down.

If the leaders and significant numbers of the membership pay fealty to the foreign government or organization over the years while manifesting hostility to every move of their own government; if they heap praise on the foreign government while consistently castigating their own; if internally they reflect as a group the thinking and the attitude of that foreign government to the point of actual identity while disassociating themselves from that of their homeland—such evidence is a legitimate and potent factor, to be evaluated in the light of all the other evidence, in determining the ultimate issue presented by § 3 (3).[37]

(iii) After attacking each of the considerations separately, petitioner further contends (Br. 52–53, 68–69) that § 13 (e) is invalid, as a whole, because it is so vague that decision is left to the Board's unfettered discretion. Pointing out that the subsection directs the Board to take into consideration eight "standards" in determining whether an organization is a Communist-action organization, petitioner argues that "[t]he Act nowhere indicates whether a registration order must be supported by adverse findings under all eight standards, or whether something less is sufficient" (Br. 52). Furthermore, it is argued, "[t]he obscurity which thus envelops section 13 (e) is made even more impenetrable by the phrase 'the extent to which,' which prefaces each of the eight standards" (Br. 52–53).

[37] Related to and overlapping petitioner's argument that the considerations listed in § 13 (e) are irrational is its argument (Br. 64–65) that the subsection is based upon "arbitrary and unreasonable" "presumptions", which are "conclusive" (Br. 65). As our discussion of the eight considerations shows (supra, pp. 134–150), they are plainly not "presumptions" of any kind, prima facie or conclusive, but factors to be weighed—akin to the many similar lists in other federal legislation providing for administrative rulings—and they are certainly not unreasonable.

This is precisely the attack which has been made, time and time again, on delegations of authority by Congress to an administrative or executive agent, and the answers which the Court has given in the past suffice to destroy the present complaint. To begin with, the fact that the Board's findings of fact are subject to judicial review, and are conclusive only if supported by the preponderance of the evidence (§ 14 (a)), in itself refutes the suggestion that the Board has any "unfettered" discretion in its fact-finding function. Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 543.[38] But, beyond that, the only "test" by which the validity of the Act must be judged is the ultimate standard of § 3 (3), containing the definition of a Communist-action organization. The Act can be invalid for reasons of vagueness only if this ultimate standard is not "* * * sufficiently precise for an intelligent determination of the ultimate questions of fact by experts." Sunshine Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U. S. 381, 400. Significantly, petitioner does not challenge the definition on the score of vagueness, but acknowledges that "the ultimate standards established by section 3 (3) are definite and meaningful" (Br. 53).

This sufficiency is not diluted by the fact that Congress, in addition to formulating the final criterion, directed the Board to "take into consideration" "the extent to which" certain factors were true with respect to a given organization in determining whether it came within § 3 (3). Congress did not tell the Board, as petitioner apparently suggests it should have, what relative weight it should give to each of the factors mentioned, or advise it as to what "extent" each factor should be present to have significance or how much significance it should have. But no such attempt to affix apothecaries' weights to abstract concepts would have been possible even if desirable. The Constitution "is not to be interpreted as demanding the impossible or the impracticable." Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrator, 312 U. S. 126, 145. This Court's decisions deny that there is any defect in Congress' directive to the Board to "take into consideration" "the extent to which" the factors mentioned are true or applicable in a given case.

In Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394, the Court upheld a congressional direction to the President, in adjusting tariffs, to "take into consideration," "in so far as he finds it practicable," a variety of economic matters—including the catch-all "any other advantages or disadvantages in competition" (276 U. S. at 401–402). In Mulford v. Smith, 307 U. S. 38, 48–49, the direction in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 to the Secretary of Agriculture that, in allotting marketing quotas among states and producers, he give "due consideration" to a variety of economic factors (307 U. S. at 43) was sustained. Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrator, supra, 312 U. S. 126, 142–146, upheld the requirement in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 that, in fixing minimum wage rates, the Wages and Hours Administrator "consider among other relevant factors" certain itemized economic considerations (312 U. S. at 136). And in Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414, 423–427, the Court sustained the directive to the Price Administrator, in establishing maximum prices on commodities, to "ascertain and give due consideration to," "so far as practicable", prices prevailing during a designated base period, and to "make adjustments for such relevant factors as he may determine and deem to be of general applicability, including" certain specified economic factors (321 U. S. at 421).[39]

The Opp Cotton Mills case, supra, is particularly pertinent. "It is urged," said the Court,

"that the statute does not prescribe the relative weight to be given to the specified factors or the other unnamed 'relevant factors.' It is said that this * * * leave[s] the function which the committee and Administrator are to perform so vague and indefinite as to be practically without any Congressional guide or control" (312 U. S. 143–144). Rejecting this argument, the Court said (at 145–146):

> * * * The fact that Congress accepts the administrative judgment as to the relative weights to be given to these factors in each case when that judgment in other respects is arrived at in the manner prescribed by the statute, instead of attempting the impossible by prescribing their relative weight in advance for all cases, is no more an abandonment of the legislative function than when Congress accepts and acts legislatively upon the advice of experts as to social or economic conditions without reexamining for itself the data upon which that advice is based.

The same point was expressed in Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U. S. 503, 516.[40]

[40] "* * * The fact that there is a zone for the exercise of discretion by the Administrator is no more fatal here than in other situations where Congress has prescribed the general standard and has left to an administrative agency the determination of the precise situations to which the provisions of the Act will be applied and the weight to be accorded various statutory criteria on given facts."

(d) The Communist Control Act of 1954 does not make it impossible for petitioner to know who its members are.

Petitioner's next challenge to the registration provisions as violative of due process is based on its reading of those provisions in the light of § 5 of the Communist Control Act of 1954, c. 886, 68 Stat. 776 (Br. 29, 75–82). The argument runs as follows: If the order of the Board becomes final, petitioner and its officers will be required to list the names of all its members in its registration statement, and "other persons" will have to "determine whether they are members" in order to know whether they are subject to the Act's sanctions and whether they must personally register in the event of petitioner's default (Br. 75). Section 5 of the Communist Control Act, continues the argument, sets forth certain "criteria for determining membership" in petitioner, so that petitioner's officers "must apply" these "criteria," as must also the "other persons" (Br. 75–76). But § 5 of the Communist Control Act establishes such "vague and irrational criteria" of membership in petitioner, the argument concludes, that it is impossible for any one to know whether or not anybody, including himself, is a member, with the alleged consequence that the registration requirements of the Act, considered in the light of § 5 of the Communist Control Act, are void for indefiniteness (Br. 76).[41]

(i) For reasons similar to those set forth supra, pp. 102–104, 121–123, this contention is premature since the stage of preparing and filing a registration statement has not yet been reached, and the Board's findings and order are valid even though some of the officers of petitioner who will have the duty to effect its registration may have good reasons for not complying with the order, or not complying fully.

[41] Section 5 provides that—

> In determining membership or participation in the Communist Party or any other organization defined in this Act, or knowledge of the purpose or objective of such party or organization, the jury, under instructions from the court, shall consider evidence, if presented, as to whether the accused person: * * *. [Emphasis added.]

This is followed by thirteen numbered paragraphs, of which it will suffice here to quote the first few as examples:

> (1) Has been listed to his knowledge as a member in any book or any of the lists, records, correspondence, or any other document of the organization;
>
> (2) Has made financial contribution to the organization in dues, assessments, loans, or in any other form;
>
> (3) Has made himself subject to the discipline of the organization in any form whatsoever;
>
> (4) Has executed orders, plans, or directives of any kind of the organization;
>
> * * * * *

A fourteenth and final paragraph provides:

(ii) In any event, the argument is unsound. As with the considerations set forth in § 13 (e) (supra, pp. 132–154), petitioner erroneously attempts to depict § 5 of the Communist Control Act as a collection of "tests" of membership, any one of which would suffice. But the language of § 5 makes it absolutely clear that its purpose is merely to list items of evidence to be considered in reaching the ultimate factual conclusion of knowing membership. It states that in determining membership, etc., the jury "shall consider evidence * * * as to whether * * *," etc. And subsection (14) provides that the enumeration of the "above subjects of evidence" shall not limit the inquiry into and consideration of "any other subject of evidence" on membership, etc. See fn. 41, supra, p. 156. Each of the evidentiary items listed is plainly a relevant consideration even though it may not be determinative. The whole section makes sense when it is realized that the Communist Party, as the evidence before the Board showed (see R. 105–106 [1994–1995]; see also United States v. Hiss, 185 F. 2d 822, 824, 829 (C. A. 2), certiorari denied, 340 U. S. 948), has traditionally had two broad types or classes of members—"open" members, who hold themselves out to the public as such and make no attempt to conceal their membership, and "secret" or "underground" members, whose membership for various reasons is known only to a select few in the organization.

Petitioner's elaborate attempt (Br. 77–82) to depict § 5 as a trap for the unwary—as a snare for catching as members persons who do not know they are members—disregards the nature of the items as non-exclusive evidentiary factors and particularly ignores the provision that the jury's consideration of the types of evidence listed be "under instructions from the court." It is to be presumed that the court's guidance of the jury in its consideration of such evidence will be an intelligent guidance. Petitioner's suggestion that the only way in which a person of prudence can under § 5 avoid the risk of being found to be a member of it is to "shun association or communication with all men" and "live the life of a hermit" (Br. 82) is certainly incompatible with that premise.

(iii) Moreover, the language of § 5 shows that the section has no application to or connection with petitioner's duty under the Subversive Activities Control Act to file a registration statement (when the order to register becomes final) listing its members, or to possible criminal proceedings against it or its officers for willfully omitting the names of any of its members in such a registration statement. The fact that § 5 is exclusively concerned with jury trials shows that it has no reference to the administrative process of filing a registration statement with the Attorney General. And the fact that it relates to jury trials in which the "accused person" (see fn. 41, supra, p. 156) is one who denies either his membership in the Party or his knowledge of the purpose or objective of the Party shows that it has no relation to possible criminal proceedings against the Party or its officers for willfully omitting the names of any of its members in the registration statement.[42]

Section 5 of the Communist Control Act might apply to criminal prosecutions brought under § 15 (a) (2) of the Subversive Activities Control Act against individual members who fail to register as required in those limited situations (defined in § 8) in which individual members are [42] Section 15 (a) (1) of the Subversive Activities Control Act provides for the punishment of the "organization" if, having been finally ordered to register, it fails to register or to file a registration statement or annual report or to keep records as required. This is the only criminal provision connected with the registration process which is applicable to organizations as such. Section 15 (b) provides for the punishment of "[a]ny individual" who, in a registration statement, willfully makes any false statement or willfully omits to state any fact required to be stated. Paragraph (2) of § 15 (b) provides that each listing of the name or address of any one individual in a registration statement shall be deemed a separate statement. The "individuals" required to file registration statements on an organization's behalf, should the organization itself fail to do so, are certain designated officers of the organization (§ 7 (h); 28 C. F. R. § 11.205; see supra, pp. 75–76, including fn. 18).

required after Board proceedings to register personally (see supra, pp. 76–77). But, as we have pointed out, it has no connection with criminal proceedings for failure, either by petitioner or by its officers, to file a full and true registration statement listing all members.

(e) The validity of the provision making each day of failure to register a separate offense is not presented, and in any case it is valid

Petitioner points out that an "astronomical accumulation" of penalties is made theoretically possible by the provision of § 15 (a) whereby each day of failure to register, once the obligation to do so arises, is declared to constitute a separate offense (Br. 28, 32–33).

(i) This contention, too, is prematurely raised in this proceeding. The penalty may never be applied to petitioner, and the issue may therefore never be reached. See United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 626–627.

(ii) On its merits, the point must be rejected. It is clear, in the first place, that there cannot be any such accumulation of penalties unless an organization which has been finally ordered to register chooses to incur them by continued deliberate non-compliance. An organization is not required under the Act to disobey a final order to test its validity. Cf. Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Ry. Co. v. Texas, 246 U. S. 58, 62; Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 145–148. The duty to register arises only after the validity of the registration requirements has been judicially determined and a final order has resulted. See supra, p. 79. Thus, penal liability results only from willful refusal to comply with a requirement laid down by Congress, implemented by a Board order after formal hearings, and upheld by the courts.

It is settled, moreover, that the extent of the permissible punishment imposable under an otherwise valid statute is, subject only to the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishments, a matter of exclusive legislative discretion. Blockburger v. United States, 284 U. S. 299, 305. Congress was no doubt aware that effective enforcement of registration and reporting requirements is difficult where continuing disobedience can result in but a single penalty, which might be considered de minimis by a large organization. And it does not follow that because a court might, in a particular case, inflict punishment in an unreasonably harsh manner that the statutory clause under which the punishment is inflicted is completely invalid. It is easy to see, for example, that the law making a separate offense of each mailing in furtherance of a fraudulent scheme could in certain cases be enforced in a confiscatory manner. But the constitutionality of the statute itself is settled. Badders v. United States, 240 U. S. 391, 394; cf. Marcus v. Hess, 317 U. S. 537, 552; Blockburger v. United States, 284 U. S. 299; Ebeling v. Morgan, 237 U. S. 625.

B. THE SO-CALLED "SANCTION" PROVISIONS OF THE ACT ARE VALID

Introduction.—Immediately upon the registration of an organization under the Act, or when an order of the Board requiring an organization to register becomes final (after judicial review), certain legal consequences automatically occur. These consequences are, generally speaking, in the nature of legal disabilities or restrictions. They are broadly classifiable into two types—those affecting the organization as such, and those affecting members of the organization. They have come to be known in this litigation as "sanctions" (see Op. 5, R. 2082). Briefly, they may be identified as the "labeling," "tax," "contributions," "employment," "passport," and "alien" provisions, the first three being applicable to organizations as entities, and the last three to individual members of the organizations affected. See supra, pp. 79–84; infra, pp. 165–201.

These sanctions are to be distinguished from the Act's criminal penalties. In addition to the criminal penalties imposed both on organizations and individuals for various offenses connected with the registration process (see supra, pp. 84–85), the Act imposes other penalties on individuals for certain offenses connected with four of the general sanctions (the "labeling," "contributions," "employment," and "passport" provisions; see supra, pp. 85–86). But, while the sanctions become automatically operative upon an organization's registration or being finally ordered to register, a criminal penalty associated with a sanction can be enforced only in the usual manner in which criminal penalties are enforced, i. e., by indictment, trial, and conviction.

Petitioner assails the sanctions of the Act on several different constitutional grounds. First, it attempts to show that the sanctions, considered together with the "public opprobrium" which results from a registration order (Br. 31), make the Act one of "outlawry" (Br. 26–33), and, as such, violative of the freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment (Br. 90–107, 113–119, 173–174). Secondly, it contends that the sanction provisions violate due process (Br. 72–75). Finally, it argues that, by virtue of the sanctions, the Act is a bill of attainder, proscribed by Article I, § 9, clause 3 (Br. 60–64). For the reasons suggested above (supra, pp. 42, 88–89, 104, 113–114), the validity of none or only some of the sanctions may now be before the Court, but in view of the Court of Appeals' treatment of this problem[43] and petitioner's extensive argument we discuss all of the sanctions.

1. The sanction provisions do not violate the First Amendment[44]

We have previously shown (supra, pp. 89 ff.) that the Act's registration provisions, as such, are consonant with the guaranties of the First Amendment. In that connection, we discussed the gravity of the evil with which Congress was dealing in this Act as well as this Court's rulings showing that First Amendment protections are far from absolute. Against the same significant back-

[43] The "alien" and "tax" sanctions have no criminal penalties associated with them, but their validity could be tested in appropriate proceedings unconnected with the present one (e. g., habeas corpus or declaratory judgment proceedings or proceedings in the Tax Court). Because the validity of all of the sanctions could be tested apart from the present proceeding, we argued in the court below that the court could properly limit its consideration to the validity of the registration provisions, and that no sanction was so functionally bound up with the registration provisions that it was required to be considered together with the registration provisions, in this proceeding, as part of a seamless web. The court below, however, rejected this contention and requested argument on the sanction provisions (supra, p. 11; Op. 4–7, R. 2081–2084) on the ground that the sanctions are "attachments" to registration and "[w]e cannot strip the registration of its attachments" (Op. 5, R. 2082).

[44] Since petitioner stresses the First Amendment, we include that provision of the Constitution in the heading for this sub-point, but to avoid needless duplication our discussion will also consider certain aspects of substantive due process related to the First Amendment issues.

ground, we now consider petitioner's related contention that the Act's sanctions are individually violative of the First Amendment (Br. 100–107) and that they confirm its contention that the Act as a whole, by in effect "outlawing" it (Br. 107), will have the practical effect of silencing it and its members as "effective" advocates of "lawful" political action, in alleged further violation of the First Amendment (Br. 91–100).

(a) Sanctions applicable to organizations as such

The sanctions which are applicable to organizations as entities are three—the "labeling," "tax," and "contributions" sanctions.

(i) The labeling requirements

When an organization is registered or has been finally ordered to register, each publication of the organization transmitted by mail or in interstate or foreign commerce and intended to be circulated among two or more persons is required to bear on its face and on any wrapper in which it is contained the statement "Disseminated by [name of organization], a Communist organization" (§ 10 (1)). Similarly, all radio and television broadcasts sponsored by the organization must be identified as being "sponsored by [name of organization], a Communist organization" (§ 10 (2)). Violation of these provisions by the organization or by any person acting on its behalf is made a punishable offense (§§ 10, 15 (c)).

These labeling requirements most nearly approach, of all the sanctions, the area of First Amendment rights. We contend nevertheless that, measured against the evil at which the Act strikes, they are well within the power of Congress to impose.

a. Labeling imposes no censorship on any mail matter or broadcast material; the content of either is immaterial. What the provisions do is not to censor the "speech," but to identify the "speaker." If such revelation interferes with the purposes of an organization by destroying its anonymity and disclosing its true nature, it is because of the unpopularity of the organization in the free market of ideas. The "restraints" are entirely social, not legal. Organizations subject to the requirement are at liberty to issue any literature or propaganda they choose, provided it is labeled and does not contain anything constituting a crime in itself, such as, for example, advocacy of the violent overthrow of the Government. Furthermore, the labeling requirements apply to organizations only. Individuals, including members of the organizations, are not subject to even the indirect restraint of labeling.

United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 625–6, Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, 290 U. S. 534, 545, 548, and Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 229 U. S. 288, 312, 315–316, all teach that such disclosure and labeling requirements may validly be imposed in order to serve a proper purpose. In Harriss, the Regulation of Lobbying Act was sustained because members of Congress have a right to know "who is being hired" to attempt to influence them, and "who is putting up the money". Burroughs and Cannon upheld the comparable provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act in order "to safeguard [a federal] election from the improper use of money to influence the result". The requirement that newspapers disclose their owners in order to enjoy second-class mail privileges was held valid in the Lewis Publishing Co. case. National Labor Relations Board v. Falk Corp., 308 U. S. 453, 462–463, upheld a requirement by the Labor Board that an employer found to have engaged in an unfair labor practice should post notices that it would "cease and desist" from like activity in the future. See, also, Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U. S. 63. None of these rulings is, of course, decisive here, but they do direct the inquiry to the aim and purpose of the particular labeling requirement. They also help to mark the bounds of the proper ends of disclosure.

b. What we have in this case is the Communist Party, foreign-controlled and engaged, among its other activities, in widespread propaganda which, whatever the immediate issue may happen to be, has always as its ultimate objective the domination, by force, of this country and the world by the world Communist movement under the leadership of the Soviet Union. Much of this propaganda is covert, and all of it attempts to sell itself to the public as peacefully and lawfully inspired. The record shows that it is petitioner's standard policy to exploit situations of human misery and legitimate grievance for the temporary foothold its organizers thereby gain in social, racial, and labor groups. The Party frequently dons its mask of respectability and sympathy to plead for various causes which it thinks will advance its own falsely assumed status as a champion of human rights (cf. Br. 92). "Basic to those techniques [of Communism] is the element of disguise. Over and over, the Communist creed poses under a thousand masks—a thousand fronts—organizations—movements—drives—with glittering, alluring appeal to snare the unwary."[45] But the ultimate objective remains steadfast and unvaried.

In theory, perhaps, if every one had the time and talent to be able to make an independent evaluation, after sufficient research, of the truth or soundness of each political utterance with which he is propagandized in the mails and over the air waves, he would have no need to know from what source the propaganda came. "But as a practical matter", as it has been cogently observed, "this independent determination is in most cases impossible, and in making judgments we are continually influenced by the source from which statements emanate" (Cohen and Fuchs, Communism's Challenge and the Constitution (1948), 34 Corn. L. Q. 182, 208). And nowhere is the need for disclosure of the true source of propaganda more pressing than in the case of a Communist-action organization. "In light of the Soviet allegiance of American communists, the extensive degree to which they use the technique of concealment, and the success that they have had in influencing public opinion by this technique, a requirement of disclosure would seem to be justified. This disclosure would greatly diminish their influence, not because of government suppression, but rather because of public recognition of their interests. Although it is true that some methods of achieving disclosure may infringe upon freedom of expression, the objective of putting the spotlight on communist propaganda does not limit that liberty, but adds to the relevant facts in the market-place of competing ideas" (id. at 208–209).

As the court below remarked, "surely the people are entitled to know when an organization which falls within the definition of a Communist-action organization in this statute is addressing them over the air" (Op. 36, R. 2113). This observation is no less true with respect to the circularization of propaganda by mail. To paraphrase the words of Mr. Justice Black, with whom Mr. Justice Douglas concurred, dissenting in Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, 251 (said in their context with reference to the Foreign Agents Registration Act):

> Resting on the fundamental constitutional principle that our people, adequately informed, may be trusted to distinguish between the true and the false, the [Act] is intended to label information [emanating from a Communist source] so that hearers and readers may not be deceived by the belief that the information comes from a disinterested source. Such legislation implements rather than detracts from the prized freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment.

Moreover, the petitioner calls itself the "Communist Party." There "seems little to choose" so far as petitioner is concerned, between being identified as "The Communist Party" and as "The Communist Party, a Communist organization," which is what the Act requires. See Op. 35–36, R. 2112–2113. It is no answer for petitioner to say that the requirement that it identify itself not only by name but as "a Communist organization" brands it "invidiously" and "discriminatorily" (Br. 106–107) in the eyes of the public. Nor is it an answer to complain that "other political parties" (Br. 93) are not subject to special labeling requirements. An organization subject to the labeling requirements of this Act is one that has been found, after a full hearing (including judicial review), to be the puppet of a foreign power, working to achieve the ends of that power—ends which encompass the extension of its totalitarian hegemony over this nation "by any available means, including force if necessary" (§ 2 (6)). Cf. National Labor Relations Board v. Falk Corp., 308 U. S. 453; Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U. S. 63.

The fundamentally erroneous premise which runs all through petitioner's First Amendment argument is that it is just another political party, expressing ideas in the political arena. It complains that the Act attempts to proscribe for "certain groups", such as Communists, "activities that are perfectly proper for everyone else" (Br. 93). But petitioner is not "just another political party" (cf. Mr. Justice Jackson, concurring in Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 566, and in American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 422–433), as the evidence in this case so overwhelmingly proved. See supra, p. 9; infra, pp. 209–261. When an agency of the world Communist movement poses tactically as a benign domestic organization and champion of constitutional liberties, while concealing its ultimate strategy of foisting a communistic dictatorship on the nation in a Czechoslovakia-type coup as soon as it feels the time to be propitious—i. e., when its leaders are in positions of sufficient power and the ranks of its lesser members have been sufficiently strengthened by the duped victims of its propaganda (cf. Mr. Justice Jackson, concurring in Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 566)—we submit that Congress can act to defeat the strategy by compelling the truthful identification of the source of the propaganda, to the end that the people may not be deceived.

c. On the premise that Congress has power to keep the channels of interstate commerce and the postal system free from concealed propaganda of this type, there is abundant precedent for the labeling requirements, which are not aimed at private correspondence but at literature sent through the mails or in commerce with the intent that it be circulated publicly.

A 1912 statutory requirement provides that newspapers and magazines, to enjoy the privileges of second-class mail, must publicly disclose the names of their owners and plainly mark with the word "advertisement" all items which have been paid for (Act of August 24, 1912, c. 389, § 2, 37 Stat. 553; now 39 U. S. C. §§ 233, 234). Sustaining this law against the charge that it unconstitutionally abridged freedom of the press, this Court quoted with approval from the committee report on the bill, as follows (Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 229 U. S. 288, 312, 315–316):

> * * * It is a common belief that many periodicals are secretly owned or controlled, and that in reading such papers the public is deceived through ignorance of the interests the publication represents. We believe that * * * it is not only equitable but highly desirable that the public should know the individuals who own or control them.

The purpose behind that statute—which this Court described as "secur[ing] to the public in 'the dissemination of knowledge of current events,' by means of newspapers, the names not only of the apparent, but of what might prove to be the real and substantial owners of the publications, and to enable the public to know whether matter which was published was what it purported to be or was in substance a paid advertisement" (229 U. S. at 315–316)—was held in no wise to constitute a forbidden invasion of freedom of the press. The pertinence of this decision seems clear. If Congress may condition the enjoyment of second-class mail privileges by publishers on their making full disclosure of the true interests represented by their publications, Congress may also require a Communist-action organization to label its publications, or else desist from distributing them by mail at all.

Similarly, the power of the Government to prevent the fraudulent use of its own mail facilities is a broad one, and has long been established.[*] This power has been sustained against contentions that it is, in itself, violative of First Amendment and other constitutional rights. In re Rapier, 143 U. S. 110; Horner v. United States, 143 U. S. 207; Public Clearing House v. Coyne, 194 U. S. 497, 507; Milwaukee Publishing Co. v. Burleson, 255 U. S. 407. More recently, this Court has sustained the power in the follow-

[*] In 1872, Congress authorized the Postmaster General to forbid the payment of money orders and the delivery of registered letters to persons or companies found by him to be conducting an enterprise to obtain money by false pretenses through the use of the mails, and to return all such letters to their senders with the word "fraudulent" stamped on the envelope (Act of June 8, 1872, c. 335, § 300, 17 Stat. 322; now 39 U. S. C. §§ 259, 732). In the same statute, Congress made it a criminal offense to place any letter or package in the mails for the purpose of carrying out any scheme or artifice to defraud (id., § 301, 17 Stat. 323; now 18 U. S. C. § 1341). In 1889, Congress declared all letters and other matter designed to perpetrate frauds to be "nonmailable" (Act of March 2, 1889, c. 393, § 4, 25 Stat. 874; now 39 U. S. C. § 256). In 1895, the Postmaster General's fraud-order powers were extended to cover all letters or other matter sent by mail (Act of March 2, 1895, c. 191, § 4, 28 Stat. 964; now 39 U. S. C. § 259). Other statutes, such as the Securities Act of 1933 (Act of May 27, 1933, c. 38, § 5, 48 Stat. 77, as amended by the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, c. 404, § 204, 48 Stat. 906; now 15 U. S. C. § 77e) and the Federal Trade Act of 1938 (Act of March 21, 1938, c. 49, § 4, 52 Stat. 114; now 15 U. S. C. §§ 52, 53), contain provisions similarly designed to rid the mails and the channels of commerce of false or fraudulent securities, advertising matter, and the like.

ing language (Donaldson v. Read Magazine, 333 U. S. 178, 190):

> All of the foregoing statutes [mail fraud statutes], and others which need not be referred to specifically, manifest a purpose of Congress to utilize its powers, particularly over the mails and in interstate commerce, to protect people against fraud. This governmental power has always been recognized in this country and is firmly established.

Rejecting a contention that the First Amendment stood as a bar to congressional action designed to free the mails of fraudulent material, the Court added (333 U. S. at 191):

> * * * None of the recent cases to which respondents refer, however, provide the slightest support for a contention that the constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and freedom of the press include complete freedom, uncontrollable by Congress, to use the mails for perpetration of swindling schemes.

Congress has not, in this Act, attempted to exercise the same degree of control as it employs to prevent the usual type of mail fraud involving financial swindles. The literature-labeling provisions constitute a far milder form of sanction or control-measure, viz, compulsory identification. The provisions do not relate to the contents of any mail matter, however fraudulent they may be, or however inflammatory. They simply identify the sender organization—which in petitioner's case has no unqualified right to conduct its affairs in secret (cf. United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U. S. 632, 652)—with an identifying phrase found to be truthful after a full hearing.

The employment of reasonable identification devices to forestall public deception has other precedents. We have already mentioned (supra, pp. 172–173) the requirement that publishers who use second-class mail facilities identify their ownership (39 U. S. C. § 233) and mark paid items as advertisements (39 U. S. C. § 234). Cf. 39 U. S. C. §§ 255, 257. In addition, all political circulars and other statements relating to candidates running for federal office, which are deposited in the mails or in interstate commerce, must include the names of the persons or groups responsible for the publication in question, as well as the names of the officers of each such group (18 U. S. C. § 612). The Foreign Agents Registration Act contains rigorous labeling requirements applicable to the dissemination of political propaganda. See supra, pp. 93, 95, 98–99.[47] These instances—along with the others we have cited—show that labeling and identification devices may be used where, as here, there is sufficient need and a proper purpose.

d. The identification requirements of § 10 pertaining to radio and television broadcasts are as valid as the literature-labeling requirements and for the same reasons. Indeed, the reasonableness of requiring accurate identification of speaker and sponsor in such mass media of communication as radio and television is even more apparent, since, because of the inherent limitations of those media, they are peculiarly subject to government control in the public interest. National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U. S. 190, 226–227; Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros. Co., 289 U. S. 266, 285; Trinity Methodist Church, South v. Federal Radio Commission, 62 F. 2d 850, 851 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 288 U. S. 599. All paid broadcasts over any radio station have been required since 1934 to be identified and announced at the time of the broadcast as having been paid for by the person furnishing the money (Communications Act of 1934, c. 652, § 317, 48 Stat. 1089; 47 U. S. C. § 317). The Act at bar simply carries this principle one step further in the case of organizations finally ordered to register by requiring them to give the additional identifying words, "a Communist organization," a phrase which, as we have shown, cannot be deemed unfairly stigmatizing or discriminatory, in view of the nature of the world Communist movement and petitioner's subordination to it.

(ii) The tax provisions

Section 11 (a) of the Act disallows the deduction for tax purposes of contributions to any organization which is registered or has been finally ordered to register as a Communist organization, and § 11 (b) denies to such an organization tax exemption under § 101 of the Internal Revenue Code (26 U. S. C. § 101).

Petitioner apparently does not seriously question the validity of these provisions, and, in any event, there can be no real doubt of the power of Congress to withdraw its legislative grace, for reasons of policy, in specific areas relating to taxation. That the conferring of tax-exempt status on an organization and permitting the deduction from gross income for tax purposes of sums contributed to such organization are matters of legislative grace is clear. Helvering v. Ohio Leather Co., 317 U. S. 102, 106; Helvering v. Northwest Steel Mills, 311 U. S. 46, 49; Cornell v. Coyne, 192 U. S. 418, 431; Rector of Christ Church v. County of Philadelphia, 24 How. 300. These grants vest no permanent right in the favored class to continue its enjoyment of special treatment (Choate v. Trapp, 224 U. S. 665, 674;

Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Ry. Co. v. Adams, 180 U. S. 1, 22) and may be withdrawn at will by legislative act. Rector of Christ Church v. County of Philadelphia, supra, 24 How. 300.

Federal tax-exemption and deductibility provisions are founded on the public interest in fostering, as a matter of policy, the types of activity pursued by the favored organizations (Helvering v. Bliss, 293 U. S. 144, 150–151), most of which enjoy that status because, by performing public services, they relieve the public pro tanto of a burden which otherwise would fall on it. Trinidad v. Sagrada Orden, 263 U. S. 578, 581. Since they thus constitute a form of subsidy to activities deemed by Congress to be beneficial to the public, Congress may withdraw its favor when it sees that a one-time beneficiary of its grace is engaged in activities thought to be inimical to the public interest. It would be strange if this Government were required to foster through special exemptions in its tax laws the activities of a domestic agency of a world-wide movement which is dedicated to its violent overthrow.

(iii) The contributions prohibition

A restriction which indirectly affects organizations required to register under the Act is the provision of § 5 (a) (2) (A) making it unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States or of any defense facility, with knowledge or notice that an organization is registered or has been finally ordered to register, to contribute funds or services thereto. Violations are punishable by fine or imprisonment or both (§ 15 (c)).

We shall assume arguendo that the effect of this prohibition on petitioner is not so remote, despite the indirectness of the impact, as to deprive it of standing to challenge. Cf. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123, 143, 150–160; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510, 535–536; Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 72–73; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 38–39; but see Tileston v. Ullman, 318 U. S. 44.

The forbidding of money contributions or other contributions of value by government and defense-facility employees to a Communist-action organization, as the term is defined in this Act, is a reasonable measure in relation to the problem which faced Congress and which led to the passage of the Act. If Congress can validly forbid employees of the United States to engage in partisan politics (United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75), it can validly forbid them to contribute to the welfare of an organization found to have as one of its primary objectives the destruction of their employer at the earliest feasible opportunity and "by any available means, including force if necessary" (§ 2 (6)).[46] If the Government has power to safeguard itself by appropriate security and loyalty investigations of its employees (see the Presidential Loyalty and Security Orders, E. O. 9835 of March 21, 1947 (12 F. R. 1935), and E. O. 10450 of April 27, 1953 (18 F. R. 2489); and cf. Peters v. Hobby, 349 U. S. 331; Bailey v. Richardson, 182 F. 2d 46 (C. A. D. C.), affirmed by an equally divided Court, 341 U. S. 918), it has also the power to forbid its employees to contribute to the treasury of an organization dedicated to its forcible overthrow. Since the prohibition has prospective effect only, no employee can complain of it. If he insists on his right to make the prohibited contribution, he must quit the employment which Congress has declared to be incompatible with this particular type of political donation. See Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485, 492.

The prohibition against the making of contributions to registered organizations by defense-facility employees, is, we submit, on no greatly different footing. The importance of keeping subversive elements out of the ranks of employees of defense facilities is no less pressing than in the case of employees of the Government itself. If Congress can validly provide that members of a registered Communist-action organization shall be ineligible for defense-facility employment, as we think it can (see infra, pp. 185–189), it can also forbid the employees of such facilities to support such an organization with money contributions.[49]

(b) Sanctions applicable to individual members of organizations ordered to register

There are three general categories of sanctions applicable to individual members of organizations which have registered or been finally ordered to register—the "employment," "passport," and "alien" provisions. Again, we assume arguendo (though the point is doubtful) that petitioner has standing to contest these provisions, which do not apply directly to it, but only to its members (see supra, p. 180).

---

[49] Petitioner points out (Br. 102) that under § 3 (6) the term "to contribute funds or services" is defined to include the "* * * making of any gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit, of money or of anything of value * * *" (emphasis supplied). From this it reasons that the prohibition of § 5 (a) (2) (A) extends to "subscribing" to a publication of an organization ordered to register, which, it argues, is a "crass violation of freedom of the press" (ibid.). It is clear, however, under the principle of ejusdem generis, that Congress, in using the term "subscription," meant the act of subscribing in the sense of "promis[ing] to give or contribute, by writing one's name with the amount" (Webster's New International Dictionary, 2d ed., unabridged), rather than in the more colloquial sense of "enter[ing] one's name for a newspaper, a book, etc." (ibid.). (This particular argument has apparently not occurred to petitioner previously; it is advanced for the first time in this Court.)

(i) The employment restrictions

The employment restrictions are broadly divisible into three types:—prohibitions against (a) employment by the Federal Government, (b) employment in any defense facility, and (c) holding office in or employment with any labor organization or as an employer-representative in a proceeding under the National Labor Relations Act.

a. The prohibition against employment by the Federal Government

When an organization is registered under the Act or has been finally ordered to register, all of its members having knowledge or notice of that fact are forbidden to conceal or fail to disclose their membership in seeking, accepting, or holding any non-elective employment with the Federal Government (§ 5 (a) (1) (A)) or to hold such employment (§ 5 (a) (1) (B)), under penalty of a fine or imprisonment or both (§ 15 (c)).

The reasonableness and validity of these provisions is clear. "The restrictions upon Government employment," as the court below observed, "are directly related to the substantive evil at which Congress was aiming in this statute. Infiltration of government by world Communist adherents is one of the specified evils recited by the Congress, and certainly a prohibition of Government employment to such adherents is a direct attack upon that evil. Indeed we can think of no more direct relationship than that which would exist between the objectives of the world Communist movement, as it is described in this statute, and the occupation of Government positions by members of a Communist-action organization" (Op. 33, R. 2110).

The prohibition applies only to those members who continue to remain such with knowledge or notice that the organization to which they belong either has voluntarily registered under the Act or has been finally ordered to do so. Bona fide termination of membership ends the applicability of the provisions. That Congress possesses the power to bar from the ranks of employees of the United States Government persons who knowingly remain members of an organization after that organization has been duly found to be a Communist-action organization, and has been finally ordered to register as such, is not to be doubted. Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183, 188–192; Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485; Garner v. Los Angeles Board, 341 U. S. 716; E. O. 9835 of March 21, 1947 (12 F. R. 1935); E. O. 10450 of April 27, 1953 (18 F. R. 2489); see also supra, pp. 180–181. And the power to exclude such members from government employment entirely includes the power to penalize those who willfully conceal their membership in order to obtain or continue to hold such employment.[50]

b. The prohibition against employment in any defense facility

When an organization is registered under the Act or has been finally ordered to register, all of its members having knowledge or notice of that fact are prohibited from concealing or failing to disclose their membership in seeking, accepting, or holding employment in any defense facility (§ 5 (a) (1) (C)) or, if the organization is a Communist-action organization, from working in any defense facility (§ 5 (a) (1) (D)), under penalty of a fine or imprisonment or both (§ 15 (c)).

These provisions are on a par with those relating to government employment. The court below summed up the pertinent considerations when it said, "We think the considerations which validate power to forbid Government employment likewise support the power to forbid defense facility employment. The latter employment is sensitive business, and it would be sheer folly to say that the Government cannot close the gates of such facilities against those who are knowingly members of organizations under the dominion of a foreign government" (Op. 34, R. 2111). Particularly is this true, we would add, when the foreign government is the very raison d'etre of most of these defense facilities.

[50] See pp. 201–206, infra, for our reply to petitioner's contention (Br. 72–75) that the government-employment prohibition violates due process because of its alleged failure to require proof of knowledge on the part of the member of the character of the organization.

The manifest purpose of these provisions is to guard against sabotage and espionage in establishments vital to the national defense. They constitute a valid exercise of the war and defense powers. Congress has never regarded itself, or been thought by the courts to be, impotent to deal with the problems of sabotage and espionage in defense facilities. See, for example, 18 U. S. C. §§ 793–794 (espionage); 18 U. S. C. §§ 2151–2156 (sabotage); Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 216–217; Gorin v. United States, 312 U. S. 19; United States v. Gray, 207 F. 2d 237, 241 (C. A. 9); Parker v. Lester, 112 F. Supp. 433, 443 (N. D. Cal.), appeal dismissed, 191 F. 2d 1020 (C. A. 9).

Nor is Congress limited, in striking at these evils, to exacting criminal penalties after they occur. It can adopt reasonable measures to prevent their occurring. The Gray case involved the constitutionality of the so-called Magnuson Act of August 9, 1950, c. 656, 64 Stat. 427, 50 U. S. C. §§ 191, 192, which, together with the regulations promulgated under it (see E. O. 10173 of October 18, 1950 (15 F. R. 7005); E. O. 10277 (16 F. R. 7537); E. O. 10352 (17 F. R. 4607)), are known as the Port Security Program. It provides for Coast Guard screening of workers in harbors, ports, vessels, and waterfront facilities. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, while it found the procedures in the particular cases before it defective, had no doubt of the power of Congress to prohibit members of subversive organizations from engaging in employment which would give them opportunities to commit sabotage and espionage. "There seems no reason to doubt," said the court (207 F. 2d at 241), "that the screening operation initiated by the Magnuson Act is a legitimate war measure." Similarly, the court in Parker v. Lester, supra, 112 F. Supp. at 443, referred to the same Port Security Program as being justified by "the undoubted right of the Nation to protect itself from subversion."

If ship and harbor workers may, subject to criminal penalties for non-compliance (50 U. S. C. § 192), be denied clearance to work as a security measure to protect our merchant marine and harbor facilities, we submit that the same considerations justify the prohibitions of § 5 (a) (1) (C) and (D) of the Act at bar. Both programs subject violators to criminal sanctions appropriate to curb the evil aimed at. Both are valid exercises of the nation's power to provide for its own survival.

We must assume that the Secretary of Defense, under the power granted him by § 5 (b), will designate "defense facilities" just as vital to national security as are ships, ports, and waterfront installations. And despite petitioner's claim of "unfettered" and "unreviewable authority" to designate all private enterprises, including the most non-sensitive (Br. 102), it is evident that the Secretary's discretion, while unquestionably broad, would not be unlimited; the rule of reason would apply here as elsewhere to supply a remedy if the authority were abused. Petitioner's further argument that its members should necessarily be allowed to work in "non-sensitive jobs in sensitive businesses" even if they can lawfully be excluded from the "sensitive" jobs in the "sensitive businesses" (Br. 102) is also untenable. Neither Congress nor the Secretary of Defense is constitutionally required to make what would surely be problematical distinctions between "sensitive" and "non-sensitive" jobs at such installations, say, as the Oak Ridge laboratories.[51] Congress has the power, if that is its policy, wholly to bar those who insist on remaining a part of the world Communist movement from establishments which, because of the general nature of their business, are properly classifiable as "defense facilities."

[51] At the present time, by contract, the Secretary of Defense exercises his discretion as to which physical areas of defense facilities that have classified government contracts shall be accessible only to persons having security clearance.

c. The prohibition against holding office or employment with a labor organization or as an employer-representative in a proceeding under the National Labor Relations Act

When an organization is registered under the Act or has been finally ordered to register, it becomes unlawful for any member having knowledge or notice of that fact to hold office in or employment with any labor organization as defined in the National Labor Relations Act (see fn. 21, supra, p. 82), or to represent any employer in any proceeding under that Act (§ 5 (a) (1) (E)), under penalty of a fine or imprisonment or both (§ 15 (c)).[82]

By its terms this prohibition is applicable only to the holding of office in or employment by labor organizations; it does not extend to mere membership in a union. We submit that the validity of this provision is a logical corollary of American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382. The Court there sustained the validity of § 9 (h) of the Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, under which the benefits of that Act were limited to unions whose officers filed with the Labor Board affidavits attesting that they were not members of the Communist Party. The objective of the clause in issue, as the Court observed, was the elimination of the obstruction to interstate commerce resulting from the so-called "political strike," which Congress had found after lengthy studies to be the result of the infiltration by Communist Party members into positions of power in labor organizations (339 U. S. at 388–389). "No useful purpose would be served," said the Court, "by setting out at length the evidence before Congress relating to the problem of political strikes, nor can we attempt to assess the validity of each item of evidence. It is sufficient to say that Congress had a great mass of material before it which tended to show that Communists and others proscribed by the statute had infiltrated union organizations not to support and further trade union objectives, including the advocacy of change by democratic methods, but to make them a device by which commerce and industry might be disrupted when the dictates of political policy required such action" (ibid.). See also Osman v. Douds, 339 U. S. 846; National Labor Relations Board v. Highland Park Co., 341 U. S. 322, 325; National Labor Relations Board v. Dant, 344 U. S. 375, 385.

The Douds decision thus accepted as a reasonable basis for the non-Communist affidavit legislation the congressional finding that Communists in positions of influence in labor unions tend to promote political strikes and thereby to endanger the national interest in time of peace as well as of national peril. This finding was reinforced by the findings of § 2 of the Act at bar, which emphasize even more forcefully the need to keep adherents of the world Communist movement out of positions of influence in labor and industry (see, particularly, § 2 (1) and (15)).[53]

On that basis, there is no significant difference between the policy and purpose of § 9 (h) of the amended National Labor Relations Act and § 5 (a) (1) (E) of the Subversive Activities Control Act. If a union officer who cannot subscribe to a non-Communist affidavit can be forced out of his position of leadership in the union by the indirect method of depriving his union of rights it would otherwise enjoy before the Labor Board, there can be no infirmity in directly prohibiting him from being on a labor union staff as an officer or employee. The justification for either method is the same—the reasonableness of removing from positions of influence in unions those persons who can reasonably be expected to use these positions to the detriment of the nation.

[53] See also the passage of the Board's report (R. 67–71 [1926–1933]) relating to Communist infiltration into the labor union movement, the control exercised by Communists over national trade union activities, the systematic training of Communist organizers to gain leverage within the basic industries, and the use made by petitioner of the political strike as an effective means of crippling the economy in periods of crisis.

In neither case is any person permanently or categorically barred from holding such a position—he can by renouncing in good faith his Communist ties resume his eligibility with respect to his union. American Communications Assn. v. Douds, supra, 339 U. S. at 414. His ineligibility is only with respect to a special category of employment and lasts only for so long as he continues it by a self-imposed exile.[54] See also infra, pp. 201–206, 208–209.

There is thus no justification for petitioner's reference to the "sanction against trade-union employment" as a "blatant example of the unconstitutional blunderbuss technique of the Act" (Br. 103). Nor is petitioner correct in saying that § 5 (a) (1) (E) is not "an exercise of the commerce power" (ibid.). By its terms the paragraph is limited to the holding of office in or employment with labor organizations as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, the scope of which, in turn, is limited by the commerce clause (29 U. S. C. § 152 (6)). The paragraph is thus a joint exercise of the commerce power and the other powers referred to in § 2 (15) (see supra, pp. 68–69). It is true that, as petitioner says, the reach of the paragraph "extends to every employee of every trade union"—provided that by "trade union" is understood "labor organization" as defined in the Labor Relations Act—regardless of the extent to which a particular position may be one "of power over the national economy" (Br. 103). But Congress is under no constitutional duty to make calculations as to the amount of "power over the national economy" a position in a labor organization must possess before barring from its occupancy members of an organization required to register under this Act. This argument by petitioner is on a plane with its similar argument (see supra, pp. 188–189) that Congress, though it may bar petitioner's members from "sensitive" jobs in "sensitive businesses", must allow them to fill "non-sensitive" jobs in those enterprises.

What has been said with respect to the prohibition against holding office or employment with a labor union applies with equal force to the prohibition against representing any employer in any proceeding arising under the Labor Act. The same logic which underlies the need to eradicate members of Communist-action organizations from positions of influence in labor unions is equally applicable to management representatives, who, from their places on the other side of the bargaining table, could not only exert an adverse influence on interstate labor-management relations and thus on interstate commerce, but could use their positions for political ends to the same (if not to a greater) extent as union officials. Such representatives are clothed with broad powers and enjoy "an operating participation in governmental facilities." National Maritime Union of America v. Herzog, 78 F. Supp. 146, 172 (D. D. C.), affirmed, 334 U. S. 854.

(ii) The passport provisions

When an organization is registered under the Act or an order directing it to register has become final, members of the group having knowledge or notice of that fact are prohibited from applying for, seeking to renew, using, or attempting to use any passport issued under the authority of the United States (§ 6 (a)). In addition, officers and employees of the United States are forbidden to issue passports to or renew passports of any individuals whom they know or have reason to believe to be members of a Communist-action organization which has registered or been finally ordered to register (§ 6 (b)). Violations of these prohibitions are punishable by fine or imprisonment or both (§ 15 (c)). Taken together, these provisions remove from eligibility for passports all persons who remain members of a Communist-action organization after it registers or is finally ordered to do so.

At the present time, a passport has the dual function of extending governmental protection while abroad and also of granting permission to travel to many parts of the world. See Schachtman v. Dulles, C. A. D. C., decided June 23, 1955. In the first aspect, a passport is addressed to foreign governments and requests for the holder "permission to come and go as well as lawful aid and protection." United States v. Browder, 113 F. 2d 97, 98 (C. A. 2), affirmed, 312 U. S. 335; Borchard, Diplomatic Protection of Citizens Abroad (1915), p. 493; cf. Urtetiqui v. D'Arcy, 9 Pet. 692, 698. An American passport "indicates that it is the right of the bearer to receive the protection and good offices of American diplomatic and consular officers abroad and requests on the part of the Government of the United States that the officials of foreign governments permit the bearer to travel or sojourn in their territories and in case of need to give him all lawful aid and protection. It has no other purpose." 3 Hackworth, Digest of International Law (1942), ch. X, § 259. Certainly, as remarked by the court below, "the Government may validly decline to confer its diplomatic protection upon, and to request foreign governments to give aid and protection to, a member of an organization operating primarily to achieve the objectives of a world movement such as the Communist movement is defined to be in this statute. Surely a government owes no duty of protection to those who, dominated by a foreign organization, seek its overthrow" (Op. 34, R. 2111).

The passport sanction is also valid insofar as it prevents travel abroad by members of a Communist-action organization.[55] Congress has specifically found in the Act that, "[d]ue to the nature and scope of the world Communist movement, with the existence of affiliated constituent elements working toward common objectives in various countries of the world, travel of Communist members, representatives, and agents from country to country facilitates communication and is a prerequisite for the carrying on of activities to further the purposes of the world Communist movement" (§ 2 (8)). It is evident that the unity and cohesive force of the world Communist movement, and its capacity to endanger the independence of this Government and the continuation of our free institutions, are promoted through personal contacts of its members both [55] Under the pre-existing legislation, it has been held that the Department of State, in exercising its discretion to grant a passport, has the power to require that an applicant disclose his connection with the Communist Party. United States v. Eisler, 75 F. Supp. 640, 646 (D. D. C.), affirmed, 176 F. 2d 21 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 337 U. S. 958. Pursuant to the authority delegated to it under 22 U. S. C. § 211a, the Department of State has promulgated rules under which, if membership in the Communist Party is admitted, an applicant for a passport must be refused one without a hearing. 17 F. R. 8013–8014, issued August 28, 1952 (22 C. F. R. §§ 51.135, 51.142).

here and abroad. For one thing, there is evidence that American Communists have secured the traditional indoctrination given to most non-Russian Communist leaders (see R. 89–93 [1965–1971]), and travel abroad by local Communist leaders certainly facilitates their effectiveness as couriers, both of intelligence to foreign countries and of directives to this country. Aside from the findings of the Board on this subject (R. 89–98 [1964–1982]), it is also of judicial record that Communist leaders have made fraudulent use of passports in the past. See, e. g., Browder v. United States, 312 U. S. 335; Eisler v. United States, 176 F. 2d 21 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 337 U. S. 958. For these reasons, the barring, in effect, of foreign travel outside of the Western Hemisphere (see Br. 103) to persons continuing their membership in an action organization is valid as an appropriate method of obtaining the serious and legitimate congressional objectives embodied in the Act. Cf. Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, 529.

Nor is it unreasonable to impose criminal sanctions for the very act of applying for a passport with knowledge of ineligibility under the law to receive one. Congress might, it is true, have limited itself to the punishment of false representations in and fraudulent use of passports—crimes already defined in the criminal code. 18 U. S. C. §§ 1541–1546; see Browder v. United States, 312 U. S. 335; Warszower v. United States, 312 U. S. 342; United States v. Rubenstein, 151 F. 2d 915 (C. A. 2), certiorari denied, 326 U. S. 766. But these remedies would not have as effectively prevented attempts by members of covered organizations to obtain passports despite known ineligibility. They could apply for and, perhaps by concealing pertinent information, obtain a passport. The use of aliases is a commonplace among them.[56] Congress preferred to forestall such frauds by making the application for a passport a crime. The further prohibitions of § 6 (a), relating to the use or attempted use of passports by members of covered organizations, are, for the same reasons, equally reasonable in the light of the Act's objectives, as is the proscription of § 6 (b) against issuing or renewing passports to such persons by federal officers and employees.

(iii) The provisions applicable to aliens

a. Exclusion and deportation

Petitioner's concession that it "recognize[s] that Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, is decisive of the validity of the deportation and exclusion sanctions" (Br. 72, fn. 31) eliminates the need for further discussion of these particular sanctions, [56] See, for example, the aliases used by Gerhardt Eisler and other foreign representatives to petitioner (R. 59–60 [1911–1913]), particularly fn. 42, R. 60 [1912]).

the terms of which are set forth at pp. 82–83, supra.

b. Ineligibility for naturalization

Under § 313 (a) (2) (G) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, which substantially reenacts and carries forward the relevant provisions of the now-repealed § 25 of the Subversive Activities Control Act, any alien who is a member of or affiliated with a Communist-action organization during such time as it is registered or required to be registered under the latter Act is ineligible for naturalization. Petitioner, while it does not expressly admit the validity of this sanction, does not specifically challenge it (see Br. 104–105). In any event, there can be no real doubt of its constitutionality, in view of the plenary power of Congress to impose conditions upon the conferring of citizenship by naturalization. Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, 131; United States v. Macintosh, 283 U. S. 605, 615. See Note, The Internal Security Act of 1950 (1951), 51 Col. L. Rev. 606, 644–645. Certainly, it lies within the power of Congress to withhold the privilege of citizenship from alien members of an organization found to be the domestic instrument of the foreign government or group controlling the world Communist movement and to be dedicated to promoting the objectives of that movement. If the exclusion and deportation sanctions are valid, as petitioner concedes (supra, pp. 198–199), the validity of this sanction follows a fortiori.

c. Denaturalization

Section 25 of the Act, besides enacting the prohibition against naturalization just discussed, contained a further provision amending the nationality laws with respect to denaturalization proceedings. Like the other provisions relating to immigration and nationality, this provision is now contained in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, which carried it forward as § 340 (c). Applying only to persons who become naturalized after the effective date of the latter Act,[57] it provides that if any such person shall within five years next following his naturalization become a member of or affiliated with any organization, membership in or affiliation with which at the time of naturalization would have precluded him from naturalization under the provisions of § 313,[58] that fact shall be considered prima facie evidence, warranting revocation of citizenship in a denaturalization proceeding if not rebutted, of lack of attachment to the principles of the Constitution and of the quality of being well disposed to [57] I. e., December 24, 1952. The Immigration and Nationality Act, passed on June 27, 1952, took effect 180 days later (§ 407, 66 Stat. 281). The provision in question in its original form, i. e., before it was transferred to the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, applied to persons naturalized "after January 1, 1951" (§ 25 of the Subversive Activities Control Act, 64 Stat. 1013).

[58] This includes Communist-action organizations registered or required to register under the Subversive Activities Control Act (see supra, pp. 82–83).

the good order and happiness of the United States at the time of his naturalization.

We submit that this sanction is likewise valid. Persons who obtain their naturalization after December 24, 1952, do so subject to the conditions and provisions laid down by Congress, including this provision. There can be no question of retroactivity, or of the Government's taking back its grant of citizenship on grounds which the naturalized person could have had no reason to anticipate when he received it. In view of the broad power of Congress to impose conditions on its grant of citizenship (Schneiderman v. United States, supra, 320 U. S. 118, 131; United States v. Macintosh, supra, 283 U. S. 605, 615) and the reasonableness of the rebuttable presumption established by this provision for the future, it cannot be said to be beyond congressional authority. Cf. Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522; Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 535–536."[59]

2. The member-sanction provisions do not rest on innocent or unknowing past membership and therefore do not deprive petitioner's members of due process

Petitioner contends (Br. 72–75) that the sanctions imposed on members of action organizations

[59] The court below did not pass upon this provision. It said, "A denaturalization does not flow automatically from registration; a regular proceeding for the purpose must be brought. No such case is before us * * *" (Op. 38, R. 2115). Accordingly, the court expressed no views as to the validity of this sanction, saying that decision thereon "must await a specific test" (ibid.).

which have registered or been ordered to register are imposed "solely because of their association" and without regard to whether or not they have "knowledge of the claimed illicit purposes of the organization", in alleged violation of the rule of Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183 (Br. 73). Petitioner also argues that, because the Act "makes conclusive a presumption of unfitness [i. e., to do the things forbidden by the sanctions] arising from membership," it conflicts with Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485 (ibid.).[80]

Petitioner's contention that the member-sanctions are visited upon "innocent" and "unknowing" members fails to take adequately into account the conditions which must be fulfilled before those sanctions become applicable. We limit our discussion to those member-sanctions applicable to citizens, viz, the employment restrictions and passport prohibitions. The alien sanctions are not, we believe, open to ary serious challenge on the grounds urged.[81] The employment and [80] We point out, once again, that petitioner raises this issue on behalf of its members, none of whom are before the Court.

[81] As has been seen, petitioner concedes the validity of the exclusion and deportation sanctions (supra, pp. 198–199), and, for the reasons set forth at p. 199, supra, we believe the validity of the naturalization sanction to be equally beyond dispute. The denaturalization sanction (supra, pp. 200–201), establishing a rebuttable presumption for the future, is plainly not subject to the type of challenge we are now discussing.

passport provisions (and their supporting criminal penalties) are applicable only when the members of an organization have "knowledge or notice"[62] either that the organization has registered voluntarily or has been finally ordered to do so after court review (§§ 5 (a) (1), 6 (a)).[63] In complaining that these sanctions are imposed on members without regard to whether or not they have "knowledge of the claimed illicit purposes of the organization," petitioner must be arguing that it is not permissible to impose sanctions on a member if he does not agree with the organization's own estimate of its character or with the formal finding made by the Board and upheld by

[62] The Act provides that publication in the Federal Register of the fact that an organization has registered or been finally ordered to register "shall constitute notice to all members of such organization" that it has so registered or been finally ordered to do so (§§ 9 (d), 13 (k)). Since petitioner does not challenge the validity of these provisions (see Br. 74, fn. 34), we shall not discuss them otherwise than to state that their validity is clear under such decisions as United States v. Balint, 258 U. S. 250, 251–252, and Shevlin-Carpenter Co. v. Minnesota, 218 U. S. 57, 68–70.

[63] As petitioner points out (Br. 74), an officer or employee of the United States is forbidden under § 6 (b) to issue a passport to any individual who he knows or has reason to believe is a member of a registered action organization or of an action organization which has been finally ordered to register, without regard to any "knowledge or notice" on the part of the applicant for the passport. This special situation, however, does not, in our opinion, affect the due process issues raised by petitioner. Cf. Op. 28, R. 2105.

the courts. Nothing in the due process clause or this Court's Wieman decision, supra, 344 U. S. 183, requires such a result.

Wieman held that the due process clause does not permit "a state, in attempting to bar disloyal individuals from its employ, to exclude persons solely on the basis of organizational membership, regardless of their knowledge concerning the organizations to which they had belonged" (344 U. S. at 190, emphasis added). "[M]embership may be innocent," observed the Court (ibid.), and "[i]ndiscriminate classification of innocent with knowing activity * * * offends due process" (at 191). But the employment and passport provisions of the Act at bar are not imposed on "innocent," "unknowing," former members of any organization. They apply only to current members of organizations which either admit being (by registering) or are formally found to be (by a judicially reviewed Board finding) substantially controlled by the foreign government or group which controls the world Communist movement, and to be primarily operating to advance the objectives of that movement.

If perchance a member was not aware of these facts before the organization's registration or the entry of a final order directing it to do so, he is made aware of them when the one or the other of these eventualities occurs. He then has it within his power to "renounce the allegiances" and effect a "voluntary alteration of the loyalties" (American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 414) which threaten to bring disabling consequences on him. He can avoid the Act's sanctions by a good-faith termination of his membership. There is thus no possibility of the unconscionable result against which the Wieman decision was aimed, viz, preclusion from legitimate employment opportunities by innocent and unknowing memberships and associations of one's past. And if the member knowingly continues his membership, he is properly subject to the sanctions. See Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485; Garner v. Los Angeles Board, 341 U. S. 716; Gerende v. Election Board, 341 U. S. 56.

Nor is petitioner's second due process contention (supra, p. 202)—i. e., that based on its reading of Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485—any more tenable. If we correctly understand the contention, it is that, after an organization has registered as a Communist-action organization, thereby admitting its character as defined in § 3 (3), or after it has been formally found to be such an organization by a Board finding which has been judicially reviewed and sustained, each member of the organization must be afforded an opportunity personally to rebut the organization's own estimate of its character, or the judicially affirmed Board finding with respect thereto, before any member-sanction can be made applicable to him on account of his continued membership. Nothing in the Adler decision, we submit, requires so strained a result.

3. The sanction provisions do not make of the Act a bill of attainder

Petitioner also contends (Br. 60–64) that the sanction provisions make of the Act a bill of attainder, forbidden by Article I, § 9, clause 3 of the Constitution. The Act, it says, "imposes various sanctions on the organization identified by the registration order and on its members" after giving the organization "only an administrative hearing; not a judicial trial" and thus, allegedly, "meets the definition of a bill of attainder" (Br. 61).

A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial on named individuals or on easily ascertainable members of a group for past conduct. Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 323; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 377; United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303, 315–317; American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 413–414; Garner v. Los Angeles Board, 341 U. S. 716, 722. Petitioner's attempt to depict itself as a possible victim of a bill of attainder, by referring to an order directing an organization to register as a "death sentence on the organization," comparable to "execution of an individual" (Br. 61; cf. Br. 63), is unavailing. The punishment inflicted must be visited on individuals.

The punishment inflicted, however, need not necessarily be punishment in the usual sense of fine or imprisonment. It may consist of deprivation of the privilege of pursuing a certain profession (Ex parte Garland, supra, 4 Wall. at 377), or in some circumstances of working for the Government (United States v. Lovett, supra, 328 U. S. at 316), or, in general, of "any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed," depending upon "the circumstances attending and the causes of the deprivation." Cummings v. Missouri, supra, 4 Wall. at 320; Garner v. Los Angeles Board, supra, 341 U. S. at 722. But it is necessary that there be punishment and that the conduct punished be past conduct. American Communications Assn. v. Douds, supra, 339 U. S. at 413–414.

Applying these principles to this Act, there can be no question of its being a bill of attainder. Under the Act, after an organization has either voluntarily registered with the Attorney General or been finally ordered to do so by the Board, its members incur the various disabilities and restrictions which have been called sanctions. That is, certain avenues of employment are foreclosed to them, they are no longer free to use passports, and, if aliens, they become excludable, deportable, and ineligible for citizenship. We have shown (supra, pp. 182–201) that these sanctions are all reasonable restrictions in the light of the objectives of the Act and the evil at which it strikes. Furthermore—and most importantly with regard to the bill-of-attainder argument—the "members" on whom these sanctions are imposed are not past or former members of the organization, but current members. The sanctions have no retroactive effect; they apply only to persons who continue their membership in the organization after it has registered or been finally ordered to do so, or who become members thereafter. Bona fide termination of membership by any person who is a member up to the time of registration or the time when an order to register becomes final precludes the sanctions' taking effect as to him.

The Douds decision, upholding the non-Communist oath provision against a similar attack, is precisely applicable to the case at bar, as petitioner practically concedes (Br. 63). Just as "there is no one who may not, by a voluntary alteration of the loyalties which impel him to action, become eligible to sign the [non-Communist] affidavit" (339 U. S. at 414), so too there is no present member of petitioner who may not, by a voluntary and good-faith termination of that membership prior to the time when the order directing registration becomes final, avoid the restrictions and disabilities imposed by the Act. For this reason, regardless of whether those restrictions and disabilities be deemed of a penal nature or not, the Act lacks one of the essential characteristics of a bill of attainder, viz, the punishment of past action or conduct. See Sutherland, Freedom and Internal Security (1951), 64 Harv. L. Rev. 383, 403.

III

THE COURT BELOW CORRECTLY SUSTAINED THE BOARD'S ULTIMATE FACTUAL FINDING THAT PETITIONER IS A COMMUNIST-ACTION ORGANIZATION AS DEFINED IN THE ACT

A. THERE IS NO OCCASION FOR A SECOND JUDICIAL REVIEW OF THE BOARD'S FACTUAL FINDING THAT PETITIONER IS A COMMUNIST-ACTION ORGANIZATION

The evidence in this proceeding consists of more than 14,000 typewritten pages of testimony from 25 witnesses (R. 134–136 [2045–2049], and more than 500 exhibits. Its presentation consumed more than 14 months (R. 2 [1805]). A unanimous Board found, on the basis of the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" (R. 132 [2042]; see also R. 133 [2044]), that petitioner is a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act and, as such, required to register. The Board presented the grounds of this finding, and the subsidiary findings on which it rests, in an exhaustive report covering 133 printed pages, which also appears in the record in annotated form, i. e., with supporting references to the testimony and exhibits (R. 1–133 [1804–2044]). This Report, arranged under appropriate headings and subheadings, summarizes the evidence on both sides; where issues of credibility were met on important points, the Board recorded its position, and where there were conflicts in the testimony on particular issues, the Board resolved them.

The court below, in discharge of its statutory obligation under § 14 (a) of the Subversive Activities Control Act, after a painstaking review of the entire record, determined that the Board's finding was "supported by the preponderance of the evidence" (Op. 75–76, R. 2152–2153), that is to say, by the greater weight of the evidence. See Lilienthal's Tobacco v. United States, 97 U. S. 237, 266; General Foods Corp. v. Brannan, 170 F. 2d 220, 223–224 (C. A. 7). The court recognized that the statutory "preponderance of the evidence" test imposed "a less stringent restriction upon the function of judicial review than is customary in such statutes" [64] and that "[b]y the same token it imposes a laborious task upon the reviewing court" (Op. 49, R. 2126). See 96 Cong. Rec. 13764–13765. Cf. Universal [64] The usual rule is that the findings of the administrative agency, if "supported by substantial evidence," shall be final. See, e. g., Administrative Procedure Act, § 10 (e) (5), 5 U. S. C. § 1009 (e) (5); National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U. S. C. § 160 (e).

Camera Corp. v. National Labor Relations Board, 340 U. S. 474, 492; General Foods Corp. v. Brannan, 170 F. 2d 220 (C. A. 7); Great Western Food Distributors v. Brannan, 201 F. 2d 476, 479 (C. A. 7), certiorari denied, 345 U. S. 997. Accordingly, in discharge of its heavy responsibility for review, which it recognized, the court devoted more than a third (Op. 48–76, R. 2125–2153) of its 76–page opinion to a discussion and analysis of the evidence on both sides. In those pages the court, while not attempting to "comment upon the evidence on each minute issue of fact" or to "evaluate particles of proof," did "indicate the extent, nature, particularity, and personal character of the testimony presented by the Government, and the nature and extent of the evidence presented by [petitioner], including the character of both its denials and its explanations" (Op. 49, R. 2126). The court concluded from this exhaustive review that two of the Board's eight subsidiary findings should be modified in respects which we shall discuss below (infra, pp. 257–261), but that otherwise all of the Board's findings, including its ultimate and decisive finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act, were supported by the preponderance of the evidence (Op. 75–76, R. 2152–2153).

This being the posture in which the case reaches this Court, we submit that there is no occasion for this Court to subject the lengthy transcript to a second judicial review for the purpose of reappraising and reevaluating the evidence and determining its sufficiency to support the Board's findings and order. Section 14 (a) of the Act provides that, where review of a Board order is sought:

> The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari * * *.

Relying on a similar provision in the Taft-Hartley Act, this Court in National Labor Relations Board v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 340 U. S. 498, 502, held that "Congress has charged the Courts of Appeals and not this Court with the normal and primary responsibility for granting or denying enforcement of Labor Board orders," and concluded (id., 502–503):

> The same considerations that should lead us to leave undisturbed, by denying certiorari, decisions of Courts of Appeals involving solely a fair assessment of a record on the issue of unsubstantiality, ought to lead us to do no more than decide that there was such a fair assessment when the case is here, as this is, on other legal issues.

This view was emphatically reiterated in National Labor Relations Board v. American Insurance Co., 343 U. S. 395, 409–410; cf. Federal Communications Commission v. Allentown Broadcasting Co., 349 U. S. 358, 364–365.

We suggest that, under the Subversive Activities Control Act, Congress charged the Courts of Appeals and not this Court with the primary responsibility for ascertaining that the findings of the Board are supported by a preponderance of the evidence. This should lead this Court to do no more than to satisfy itself that the Court of Appeals made a fair assessment of the record on the issue of the sufficiency of the evidence. That the Court of Appeals did so, we submit, is evident from its opinion.

B. THE COURT BELOW CORRECTLY AFFIRMED THE BOARD'S FINDINGS AS BASED ON THE PREPONDERANCE OF THE EVIDENCE

The Board found that petitioner, "[u]pon the overwhelming weight of the evidence", "is substantially directed, dominated and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement" and "operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement" (R. 132 [2042]). These findings brought petitioner within the § 3 (3) definition of a Communist-action organization and made it subject, as such, to the mandatory registration requirements of the Act. In this sense these findings may be described as the ultimate or decisive findings of the Board. In addition to these ultimate findings, the Board made subsidiary findings keyed to the eight paragraphs under § 13 (e), which lists the various factors required to be taken into consideration by the Board in arriving at its ultimate determination. See supra, pp. 132–154. Thus, for example, the Board made a finding, corresponding to § 13 (e) (1), that petitioner's "policies are formulated and carried out and its activities are performed pursuant to directives of, and to effectuate the policies of, the Soviet Union, which directs and controls the world Communist movement" (R. 79 [1947–1948]). Similarly, the Board made a finding, corresponding to § 13 (e) (2), that petitioner's "views and policies do not deviate from those of the Soviet Union" (R. 86 [1959]). And so on with respect to the other paragraphs of § 13 (e).

The evidence of record is elaborately summarized in the Report of the Board, which contains detailed supporting references. It has further been carefully reviewed in briefer form in the opinion of the Court of Appeals, which on the basis of its "laborious" study of the record affirmed the order of the Board as supported by "the preponderance of the evidence." It would accordingly lengthen this brief to no useful end to go over the same ground a third time here. Nor does this appear to be required in this case, for petitioner makes no attempt to assay the significance of any of the proof it attacks from the standpoint of the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole. Its attack, rather, is concentrated on the minutiae of the evidence, frequently lifted out of context. This fragmentary approach overlooks the fact that, as the court below remarked, "all relevant facts are cumulative in delineating a completed whole" (Op. 61, R. 2138). One knows "fish from fowl," to use the court's figure (ibid.), as a result of simultaneous consideration of an accumulation of evidence, seen from an over-all view. Petitioner's approach to the evidence ignores the fact that, to change the figure, an unmistakable pattern or mosaic can emerge from numerous fragments having little individual significance. "When the parts are put together," the court below observed, "the picture is clear and forceful" (Op. 75, R. 2152). Cf. Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U. S. 208, 223–226.

Viewed from the standpoint of the record as a whole, petitioner's criticisms are but pinpricks at the evidence, often relating to matters having obviously minor bearing on the ultimate issue. It is evident, moreover, that the members of the Board, who saw and heard and questioned the witnesses on both sides and could observe their demeanor on the witness stand, had seats of vantage from which to see the development of the picture which the evidence, viewed as a whole, so clearly portrays.

We deal below with petitioner's attack on the evidence relating to the statutory considerations listed in § 13 (e) (Br. 120–158), its contention that the Board's conclusion that petitioner is a Communist-action organization is based on evidence of conduct which has been discontinued (Br. 160–170), and its attack on the legislative determination, underlying the Act, that there exists a world Communist movement as described in § 2 (Br. 193–199).

1. The Board and the court below correctly construed and applied the evidentiary considerations enumerated in § 13 (e) of the Act

Congress, in § 13 (e) of the Act, directed the Board, in "determining whether any organization is a 'Communist-action organization' ", to "take into consideration" the "extent to which" the organization or its leaders do certain things. We have previously indicated the error in petitioner's assumption that these evidentiary factors are "tests" of whether an organization fulfills the § 3 (3) definition of a Communist-action organization as distinguished from matters, as the statute plainly indicates, "to be taken into consideration" and evaluated by the Board in making its ultimate determination (supra, pp. 132–133). This error is carried over into petitioner's discussion of the evidence. Thus petitioner contends (Br. 120–160) that the Board's order and the judgment of the court below affirming it "are based on erroneous interpretations of § 13 (e) and on evidence having no rational relation to the criteria of that section or to the definition of a Communist-action organization" (Br. 120). A brief discussion of petitioner's attack on the proof adduced with respect to four of these considerations will expose the insubstantial nature of petitioner's factual contentions when weighed against the obvious purpose of the statutory guides and the thrust of the evidence, considered as a whole.[65]

(a) The directives and policies consideration

Section 13 (e) (1) directs the Board to take into consideration, in determining whether an organization is a Communist-action organization, the extent to which its policies are formulated and carried out and its activities performed "pursuant to directives or to effectuate the policies of" the foreign government or organization which directs and controls the world Communist movement. The Board devoted more than one-half of its 133-page Report (R. 9–79 [1820–1948]) to a review and analysis of the evidence pertaining to this factor. It stated its conclusions under this heading in eleven numbered paragraphs (R. 78–79 [1946–1948]), the last of which, using the substance of the language of § 13 (e) (1), was that "[petitioner's] policies are formulated and carried out and its activities are performed pursuant to directives of, and to effectuate the policies of, the Soviet Union, which directs and controls the world Communist movement" (R. 79 [1947–1948]). The remaining ten paragraphs were in the nature of subsidiary conclusions, on which the eleventh was based. One of the ten—the fourth (R. 78 [1946])—stated that:

[65] Petitioner's contentions with respect to the proof relating to the remaining four evidential factors, which we do not discuss, are similarly insubstantial and, in view of the force of the findings which we review, of cumulative significance only. The court below modified the Board's findings with respect to "reporting" (Br. 146–150) and "secret practices" (Br. 153–154), but correctly concluded that these modifications did not require a remand to the Board in view of the overwhelming nature of the findings which were sustained (Op. 72, 73–74, R. 2149, 2150–2151; see infra, pp. 257–261). The Board did not rely heavily on the evidence relating to "financial aid" (see Br. 145), all of which, with but one exception, related to the pre-1940 period (R. 88–89 [1964]). Similarly, the Board found, with respect to the "instruction and training" factor (Br. 146), that there was "no substantial evidence of record showing training of [petitioner's] members in the Soviet Union subsequent to the outbreak of World War II" (R. 92 [1971]).

> Marxism-Leninism, as understood, used and followed by [petitioner], consists of a body of doctrine, policies, strategies and tactics intended to bring about the end of capitalism and substitute for it a dictatorship of the proletariat; it has been promulgated and issued by the Soviet Union as the overall philosophy, authoritative rules, directives and instructions governing the world Communist movement.

Corresponding to the foregoing paragraph of its conclusions, the Board, in the body of its Report, following an extended discussion of the so-called

Marxist-Leninist "classics"—consisting primarily of the writings of Marx, Lenin, and Stalin (R. 21 [1841])—had said (R. 43 [1882]):

> Consequently, we conclude that the Classics are one of the chief means by which the CPSU [Communist Party of the Soviet Union] directs, dominates, and controls the CPUSA.

From the 70 pages of the Report dealing with the "directives and policies" factor petitioner selects the two above-quoted statements (Br. 122, 123) as establishing that the Board erroneously adopted the "thesis" that a "comprehensive body of thought" setting forth a "unified and all-embracing view of man and nature" and covering "almost every area of human thought and activity"—i. e., Marxism-Leninism—constitutes "a set of 'directives and instructions', promulgated and issued' by the Soviet Union [to petitioner]" (Br. 123). Petitioner points out that some of the literature of Marxism-Leninism was "written long before there was a Soviet Union" (Br. 124).

The statements in question, however, when read in context, fail to support petitioner's argument. Their immediate context shows—petitioner omits the qualifying words in its quotation at Br. 122—that it was "Marxism-Leninism, as understood, used and followed by [petitioner]" (R. 78 [1946], emphasis added) about which the Board was speaking. And the Board in its Report carefully explained just what the concept, so qualified, connotes (R. 21–44 [1840–1883]). When the term "Marxism-Leninism" is understood in the sense in which the Board used that term, its statements with respect to it and the "classics" are cogently supported by the evidence.

The Board, after pointing out that petitioner describes itself in its constitution as a political party based on the "principles of scientific socialism, Marxism-Leninism" and that its amended answer had admitted that Marxism-Leninism is basic to it (R. 21 [1840–1841]), observed that "Marxism-Leninism is nowhere in the record specifically defined" (R. 21 [1841]). The Board, noting further that it "recognize[d] that the theory of Marxism-Leninism, as such, is not in issue in this proceeding," stated (ibid.):

> * * * However, in view of the fact that Marxism-Leninism is declared to be basic to [petitioner] and because of the numerous references to it in the course of these proceedings, and in order to cast as much light as possible upon the issues involved, we have deemed it important to determine its actual meaning from the evidence of record. In this section, we present our findings of what it is, and how it is understood, used and followed by [petitioner]. [Emphasis added.]

The Board proceeded to trace the history of Marxism-Leninism. After explaining how "Marxism" originated with Marx and Engels in the middle of the nineteenth century, and after stating the basic tenets of that philosophy (R. 21–22 [1841–1843]), the Board pointed out that Lenin "adapted Marxism to Russian revolutionary purposes" (R. 22 [1843]) and that "Stalin later advanced the Marxist-Leninist ideas to a practicality which developed somewhat differently from Marxist theoretical schemes" (ibid.). The Board then quoted from Stalin's History of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (Bolsheviks), which, upon its publication in 1939, became for Communists the world over the supremely authoritative Marxist-Leninist work, superseding in importance all predecessor classics,[66] to show "how Lenin altered Marxism because of his experience in the Russian revolutions of 1905 and 1917" (R. 23 [1844]). "The tactical aspects of the theory," the Board observed, "thus attains [sic] a flexibility which would appear to make it mean what the current leaders of the CPSU want it to mean. So regarded, the theory supplies an easy explanation for all phenomena and furnishes a justification for any line of conduct which these leaders have adopted" (ibid.).

[66] See witness Meyer's testimony at R. 689, quoted in the Board's Report (R. 43 [1880–1881], fn. 30). A joint resolution adopted by the Communist Parties of France, Great Britain, the United States, Germany and Italy in August 1939 (A. G. Ex. No. 296, R. 1601–1609) referred to Stalin's History as occupying "an extraordinary place among the classic works of Marxism-Leninism" (R. 1602), and stated that the appearance of the work was "one of the greatest events in the life of the Communist world movement" (R. 1601).

The Board then proceeded, by extensive references to the classics, all of which were used in Party schools as the basic text books and instruments of indoctrination continuously up to the time of the hearings herein (R. 38 [1872]; see also R. 689, 787–788, 943–946, 949–952, 1014), to show how, throughout, they contain instructions and directives to Party members as to how they should conduct themselves and what action they must take, in working toward the goal of the "dictatorship of the proletariat," in all sorts of tactical situations (R. 28–44 [1855–1883]), depending upon the "ebb and flow" of events (R. 29 [1856]). For example, when the revolutionary tide in a certain country is rising, i. e., when the ruling classes are disorganized and the masses are in a state of revolutionary ferment, mass action culminating in the general strike and armed insurrection is enjoined upon members (Programme of the Communist International, A. G. Ex. No. 125, R. 1446, at 1459; cited by the Board at R. 30 [1857]). When, on the other hand, the revolutionary tide is at ebb, members are directed to adopt "united front" tactics, to limit themselves to "partial" slogans, and to adjust their demands to the everyday needs of workers (id., at R. 1460–1461; cited by the Board at R. 30 [1858]).

Members are directed to carry on ceaseless propaganda against "all forms of chauvinism" and "imperialist maltreatment of enslaved peoples and races" (id., at R. 1457; cited by the Board at R. 30 [1857]). They are instructed to infiltrate and where possible to capture control of trade unions as ready-made instrumentalities for use in the furtherance of the revolutionary goal (Lenin, What Is To Be Done?, A. G. Ex. No. 417, pp. 105 ff.; Stalin, Problems of Leninism, A. G. Ex. No. 138, R. 1500, at 1508–1509; Theses and Statutes of the Third (Communist) International, A. G. Ex. No. 8, R. 1318, at 1328, 1331; all cited by the Board at R. 34 [1865]). Special efforts are to be made to capture the mind of youth for the revolutionary struggle (see numerous references cited by the Board at R. 34–35 [1866–1867]). Many more instances might be cited, but these will suffice to show what the Board meant by the statements petitioner criticizes. Thus the Board's statements, far from being "absurd" (Br. 123), are thoroughly documented by the evidence.

Of course, the Board did not by any means base its "directives and policies" findings exclusively upon the classics of Marxism-Leninism. On the contrary, those works form but one part of the mass of evidence on which those findings were predicated. It will suffice for present purposes to invite the Court's attention to that portion of the Board's Report wherein the Board reviews the extensive evidence that, throughout petitioner's existence, it has from time to time received directives as to the formulation and carrying out of its policies, programs, and activities from representatives of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union traveling in this country (R. 59–61 [1910–1913]). It was on the basis of this and the other evidence before the Board that the court below observed, with reference to those findings of the Board relating to the directives and policies factor of § 13 (e) (1), that (Op. 71, R. 2148):

> * * * Without recapitulating or reciting the multitudinous bits of evidence which underlie these findings, we simply state that in our view a clear preponderance of the evidence supports them. As we have made clear, there is scarcely a dispute as to the period prior to 1940, and there is ample evidence in this record as a whole, when balanced against the proof offered to the contrary, to support their accuracy as to the present.

(b) The non-deviation consideration

The Board found that "the views and policies of [petitioner] throughout its history invariably coincide with the views and policies of the Soviet Union. Moreover, [petitioner] conforms immediately to each reversal in the Soviet Union's views and policies" (R. 86 [1959]), and concluded that "[petitioner's] views and policies do not deviate from those of the Soviet Union" (ibid.). The overwhelming evidence supporting this finding is summarized in the Board's Report at R. 79–86 [1948–1959] and is more briefly reviewed in the opinion below at Op. 68–69, R. 2145–2146.

Petitioner does not deny the fact of the identity of its program and policy with that of the Soviet Union. As we have seen (supra, pp. 139–140), proof of the fact of identity is all that is contemplated by § 13 (e) (2). Petitioner's discussion of this consideration (Br. 137–144), therefore, is but a further attack on the relevance of non-deviation as one factor tending to establish foreign domination and control—a contention which we have shown to be without merit (supra, pp. 139–140).

Petitioner presses its argument by urging that to establish non-deviation within the meaning of § 13 (e) (2) it must be shown that in each instance the view it shared with the Soviet Union, (1) was adopted by it after its adoption by the Soviet Union (Br. 138–140), (2) was itself false or unreasonable and not generally accepted (Br. 140–141), (3) was not "calculated to promote the peace and well-being of the United States" (Br.

141–142), and (4) did not emanate from a common philosophy (Br. 142–144).

The argument is beside the point, for it is obvious that Marxist-Leninist philosophy as implemented by the Soviet Union may have caused petitioner to adopt views on specific issues that were not themselves unreasonable and were not inconsistent with the well-being of the United States. Such is to be expected. Proof, therefore, that this was the case with respect to selected issues was, as the Board consistently ruled (R. 836–845, 861–864, 1274–1275), not relevant to the question of non-deviation. The point of non-deviation is not that petitioner's views on every issue were hostile to the interests of the United States, or that they were necessarily evil in themselves.[67] The point is rather that the fact that a domestic organization, throughout its thirty years' history, has undeviatingly mirrored the views of the foreign power which controls the world Communist movement on every significant aspect of world politics is evidence, to be weighed with all the other evidence, that that foreign power controls the domestic organization and that the domestic organization operates primarily to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement.[68] Petitioner's repeated asser-

[67] Petitioner's collateral attempt (Br. 170–173) to attack this aspect of the proof as inconsistent with its right of free speech under the First Amendment is therefore grounded on a mistaken premise.

[68] Petitioner's repeated assertion, made for the first time in its brief on the merits in this Court, that the Board and the tion that such an inference is irrational offends common experience. The inference is an entirely reasonable and natural one.[69]

It is true, as petitioner observed in its petition for certiorari, that the fact that two persons "both believe that the sum of two and two is four" (Pet. 73) does not give rise to an inference that one controls the other. It is also true that the fact that "two organizations oppose racial discrimination and segregation" (Br. 140) does not prove that the one is under the other's dominion. But the fact that petitioner, in conformity with the position of the Soviet Union, denounced Fascism in Nazi Germany as a peace menace until the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939, following which it about-faced and, with the Soviet Union, hailed the Pact as an outstanding contribution to the peace of the world (see R. 82 [1953]; Op. 68, R. 2145), is evidence of a different character. The evidence court below were in disagreement as to the evidential effect of the "non-deviation" finding with respect to the ultimate findings (Br. 142, 175–176, 192) is unsupported by the record references it cites (R. 80–86 [1948–1959]; Op. 45, R. 2122) or by anything else in the record. The Board made it abundantly clear, moreover, that its conclusions of fact rested upon the whole record (see R. 132 [2042]), as did the court below (Op. 75–76, R. 2152–2153).

[69] Cf. 96 Cong. Rec. 14532 (observations on this point by Senator Mundt).

at bar was of the latter type. "Dr. Mosely's [70] testimony," observed the Board, "traced the continuing stream of international questions, upon which both the Soviet Union and the CPUSA have announced a position. He enumerated some 45 international questions of major import, extending over the past 30 years, with respect to which there was, as revealed by his testimony, no substantial difference between the position announced on each by the Soviet Union or its official and controlled organs and that announced by the CPUSA or its official and controlled organs. * * * [Petitioner's] witnesses were unable to cite a single instance throughout its history where, in taking a position on a question which found the views or policies of the Soviet Union and the United States Government in conflict, the CPUSA had agreed with the announced position of the United States; nor could they show a single instance when the CPUSA had disagreed with the Soviet Union on any policy question where both [petitioner] and the Soviet Union have announced a position" (R. 80 [1948–1949], 85 [1958]).[71]

[70] Dr. Philip E. Mosely, Professor of International Relations at Columbia University and Director of the University's Russian Institute, was the Attorney General's expert witness on "non-deviation" (R. 136 [2048]).

[71] The testimony of petitioner's witnesses, Gates and Flynn, to which the Board referred, appears at R. 1247–1248, 1299–1300. Both have been members of petitioner's National Committee for many years, the former since 1945 (R. 1199), and the latter since 1938 (R. 1275).

Petitioner's contention that the proof of non-deviation failed, because it was not shown as to all of the issues in question that the position held by both the Soviet Union and petitioner was first adopted by the Soviet Union and thereafter announced as the position of petitioner, is equally without substance. As the court below held: "The statutory phrase [non-deviation] refers to identity or coincidence and not to chronological adoption" (Op. 69, R. 2146). Indeed this is the only tenable construction, for Congress could hardly be supposed to have placed upon the Board the impossible task of determining the exact time when a foreign government "first established" (Br. 138) each of its positions on political affairs.

Furthermore, contrary to the implications of petitioner's suggestion, a great deal of the non-deviation evidence itself showed that petitioner's adoption of a given position or policy did in fact follow the adoption of that position or policy by the Soviet Union. The sudden reversal of petitioner's attitude vis-à-vis Nazi Germany following the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939, to which we have already referred (supra, p. 227), provides one example of this. Another is petitioner's overnight change of view as to the justness of the war against Germany, which followed the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941 (see R. 82–83 [1953]; Op. 68, R. 2145). A third is petitioner's abrupt reversal on June 29, 1948, of its attitude toward the Tito Government in Yugoslavia, following the Cominform's and Soviet Union's bitter attack on that Government on June 28, 1948 (R. 83 [1954]; Op 68–68, R. 2145–2146).[72]

The testimony of petitioner's witnesses, to the effect that all these parallelisms of view between petitioner and the Soviet Union, including the abrupt reversals and re-reversals, were coincidences which sprang from their joint concern for the true interests of the American people, was considered and evaluated by the Board (R. 85 [1958]) and was also taken into consideration by the court below in the performance of its review function (Op. 69–70, R. 2146–2147). In the light of the whole record the conclusion is inescapable that the Board was amply justified in refusing to credit this testimony.

(c) The discipline consideration

Petitioner's contention (Br. 150–152) that the Board and court below misconstrued and mis-

[72] See also, among other incidents referred to in the Board's Report, the evidence relating to the purge trials of Communist leaders in the Soviet Union in 1937 (R. 83 [1954]), the Russo-Finnish War (R. 83 [1954]), the absorption of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania (R. 83 [1954]), and the Berlin Blockade (R. 83 [1954–1955]). Petitioner points out that, with respect to certain of the "non-deviation" issues, "the domestic exhibits antedated the foreign exhibits" (Br. 139, fn. 79). But obviously the dates of the exhibits do not necessarily reflect the dates when the views and policies evidenced therein were adopted.

applied the discipline factor of § 13 (e) (6)—i. e., the direction to the Board to consider, in determining whether an organization is a Communist-action group, "the extent to which its principal leaders or a substantial number of its members are subject to or recognize the disciplinary power" of the foreign government or organization controlling the world Communist movement, or its representatives—is in reality nothing more than an attack on the sufficiency of the evidence supporting the Board's finding on this point. The Board found that "[petitioner's] principal leaders and a substantial number of its members are subject to and recognize the disciplinary power of the Soviet Union and its representatives" (R. 104 [1993]). The evidence supporting this finding is reviewed in the Board's Report at R. 98–104 [1982–1993]. The court below reviewed the evidence on this point at Op. 72–73, R. 2149–2150, and concluded that the Board's finding was supported by "a clear preponderance of the proof" (Op. 73, R. 2150).

As the Court of Appeals observed, "[t]he requirement of iron discipline within the Communist movement is one of the basic principles of the movement. It is the 'democratic centralism' so vigorously insisted upon by Communist leaders in both speeches and documents" (Op. 72, R.

2149),[11] and "[i]dentification of the Soviet Union as the leader of the world Communist movement is amply shown" (Op. 73, R. 2150).

Petitioner's argument under this heading illustrates its mistaken insistence, met with throughout its discussion of the evidence, that the evidence under each of the § 13 (e) categories be considered in vacuo, unconnected with and unilluminated by any of the other evidence of record. Thus, after devoting more than a page (Br. 151–152) to summarizing specific examples, cited in the Board's Report, of expulsions of members from its ranks (including a 1951 expulsion for the offense of "urging others to distribute anti-Soviet leaflets", Br. 152) and other instances of the "iron discipline" exercised over its membership, petitioner argues that none of such evidence can "conceivably support the Board's finding that petitioner and its members are subject to Soviet discipline" (Br. 152). Not only does this argument ignore the evidence tending to illuminate these incidents, to which the Board refers in discussing this evidence (see, e. g., R. 99–102 [1983–1989], but it ignores all the other evidence of record which inexorably points to the fact that petitioner is Soviet-controlled.

[11] For an explanation of the principle of "democratic centralism" and how it works as a disciplinary factor among Communists throughout the world, see the Board's Report at R. 27–28 [1852–1855], 56–57 [1904–1906].

The argument is also based in large measure on petitioner's erroneous assumption, continually reiterated in its brief, that the Board and the court below were required to accept its organizational disaffiliation from the Communist International in 1940 as involving a substantive as distinguished from a merely formal change in its relationship to that body, the Soviet Union, and the world Communist movement. On the contrary, we submit that the Board's (R. 14 [1828–1829]; R. 130 [2038]) and the court's (Op. 64–65, R. 2141–2142) refusal to accept that premise was amply justified by the evidence.

(d) The allegiance consideration

The Board found that "[petitioner's] leaders and its members consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their loyalty and obligations to the Soviet Union" (R. 128 [2034]). The overwhelming evidence supporting this finding is summarized in the Board's Report at R. 118–128 [2016–2034]. The court below, remarking that "[t]he evidence on this point is long and in great detail" (Op. 74, R. 2151), reviewed it briefly at Op. 74–75, R. 2151–2152, and concluded that the Board's finding was "amply supported" (Op. 75, R. 2152).

One of the several grounds on which the Board based its finding on this point consisted of petitioner's teachings concerning the necessity and desirability of forcible overthrow of the United States Government to achieve its ends. After reviewing the evidence on this subject (R. 118–122 [2017–2023]), the Board observed that "[petitioner's] adherence to and implementation of a concept requiring the overthrow of the United States Government by any means, including force and violence, is completely incompatible with, and the exact antithesis of, allegiance to the United States" (R. 122 [2023–2024]). In attacking these findings, petitioner (Br. 154–158), asserting that the Board reached its conclusion that petitioner advocates the violent overthrow of this Government "primarily from excerpts from the Communist Manifesto and the writings of Lenin and Stalin", argues that this Court, in Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, "after a study of the same texts", concluded that "adherence to Marxism-Leninism is not inconsistent with attachment to the principles of the Constitution and being well-disposed toward the good order and happiness of the United States" (Br. 155). The contention does not bear analysis.

In the first place, the Board's finding with respect to petitioner's teachings concerning the use of force and violence does not rest "primarily", as petitioner asserts, on the literature of Marxism-Leninism. It was based as much on the personal testimony of witnesses, who had been members of petitioner, recounting their individual experiences (R. 121 [2022]). That testimony established that petitioner "in reality advocates the overthrow of the government of the United States by force and violence" (ibid.). The membership of these witnesses "spanned the entire existence of the Party until January 1951" (ibid.). Their positions in the Party "ranged from high offices to rank and file Party membership" (ibid.). Included among them was a former General Secretary of the Party (Tr. 1698), the highest executive position in the organization (Tr. 1697), and a former managing editor of the Daily Worker (R. 1127), the Party's official organ. Truly, as the Board observed, these witnesses "were in a position to know whereof they spoke" (R. 121 [2022]).[74]

[74] Petitioner's attempt to disparage the Board's reliance on the testimony of these witnesses for its force-and-violence finding (Br. 155, 205–207) does not avail it. The Board cited the testimony of ten witnesses for this proposition (R. 121 [2022]). Petitioner concentrates its attack on four of these witnesses (see Br. 205). It alleges that two, both of whom concededly so testified on direct examination (Br. 205), retracted their testimony on cross-examination (Br. 155, 205–206); that a third gave no testimony at all on the subject (Br. 155, 206); and that the fourth gave conflicting testimony (ibid.). The record does not bear out petitioner's contentions. There was no retraction in fact on the part of the two witnesses whom petitioner alleges to have done so (see R. 501–506 (Honig); R. 649, 675–678 (Johnson)); the witness who allegedly gave no testimony on the subject, Meyer, did in fact give testimony which, fairly construed, warranted the Board in citing it (see R. 729, 730–731); and Furthermore, the literature of Marxism-Leninism to which the Board referred in its Report was not limited to the literature which this Court considered in the Schneiderman case. In Schneiderman, the relevant literature was that which had been published prior to 1927, the date of Schneiderman's naturalization (320 U. S. at 148). The writings which were published after that date, the Court said, were "entitled to little weight because they were published after the critical period" (id. at 151–152). Here, on the other hand, the Board had before it all the significant literature of Marxism-Leninism published up to the time of the hearings herein, which included a span of more than twenty years beyond the "critical period" of the Schneiderman case. Even on the basis of the literature which this Court considered in Schneiderman, the Court did not question that it could reasonably have been found that "the Communist Party in 1927 actively urged the overthrow of the Government by force and violence" (320 U. S. at 153).[75] The literature received in evidence by the Board in this case, on the other hand, a few "illustrative" passages from which the Board quotes in its Report (R. 118–119 [2017–2020]), leaves no doubt that force and violence was and is advocated as a means of overthrowing all "bourgeois" governments, including that of the United States. Significantly, the two works from which the Board quotes for "illustrative" purposes—Stalin's Problems of Leninism (1934) and Foundations of Leninism (1932)—were not even in evidence in the Schneiderman case.[76]

there was no real conflict in what the fourth witness said on the subject (see R. 1053–1055). Petitioner's allegation that the Board's Report "conceals" testimony by government witness Lautner favorable to it on the force-and-violence issue (Br. 267, 155) is without record support. Lautner gave no such testimony, but on the contrary characterized petitioner's latter-day statements (R. 979–981, 983–984, 1696, 1705) as "self-serving" (R. 979) and as "poppycock" (R. 985, 997), because they were "in contradiction to the basic principles of Marxism-Leninism" (R. 975) to which petitioner adhered (R. 1695).

Petitioner's contention (Br. 160–170) that "the order of the Board and the decision below violate the Act because they rest on alleged conduct of the petitioner which, if it ever took place, had

[75] As the Court observed in Schneiderman, the issue there was not whether the Communist Party in 1927 had urged the overthrow of the Government by force and violence, but rather whether the Government had sustained its burden of proving, by "clear, unequivocal, and convincing" evidence, that Schneiderman himself was lacking in attachment to the Constitution at the time of his naturalization (320 U. S. at 153–154).

[76] The dates given are the dates of the first editions published in the United States. According to petitioner, these works had been written in 1926 and 1924, respectively (Br. 198, n. 116).

been discontinued prior to enactment of the Act". (Br. 160) is without merit. The finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization and the order directing it to register as such are based on petitioner's current practices and activities as illuminated by its entire past history.

"In reaching our conclusion herein," the Board said (R. 130 [2038])— > we have considered and weighed commensurately, therefore, such pre-Act evidence as reasonably tends to establish or illuminate the present nature, activities, character, and status of [petitioner] in connection with the issues presented for decision. * * * As the Supreme Court of the United States has stated, "present events have roots in the past." This is particularly true in this proceeding where consideration thereof brought to light facts, and raised presumptions and inferences tending to show [petioner's] true current purpose, as well as the nature of its present conduct. We have been able to trace [petitioner's] operations over more than thirty years into the present and have found that at no time during this period has [petitioner] changed its fundamental objectives, or its nature and purpose. There are no protestations of repentance and reform; and, though [petioner] continually points to its "disaffiliation" from the Communist International, for example, as a severance of its relation> ship with international Communism, a study of its pre-Act existence properly enabled us to adjudge that this was, at most, only a superficial act designed in the interest of domestic political expediency to circumvent adverse legislation (Voorhis Act).

That an organization's past history is a relevant and important consideration in determining its present character and status cannot be doubted. See Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 703–706; United States v. Oregon Medical Society, 343 U. S. 326, 333; United States v. Reading Co., 253 U. S. 26, 43–44; Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 74–76; United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201, 231 (C. A. 2), affirmed, 341 U. S. 494." It is both good sense and good law to use the past to illuminate the present. As the court below said (Op. 63–64, R. 2140–2141):

> The past is clearly pertinent to the present nature of a person or an organization. Surely a person's education and experience are pertinent to his present nature. The same is true of an organization. As a matter of fact it is rarely, if ever, possible > to prove present nature by some instantaneous, contemporaneous fact, totally ignoring the whole of the past. Not only is the past clearly pertinent, it may be quite material to a determination of present nature. Whether it is material depends upon whether there is affirmative evidence of a departure from the established past. In the ordinary affairs of life and in ordinary litigation, if a person or an organization is shown to have had over many years a certain policy and program, and no more is shown, the conclusion is clearly indicated that he or it has the same policy and program in the present.

" Petitioner's attempted distinction of the Dennis case (Br. 168–169, fn. 98) is unsound. In the present case as well as in Dennis, acts and events occurring prior to the critical period were treated as "media concludendi" as distinguished from "the factum itself" (183 F. 2d 201, 231). This is made clear by the passage from the Board's Report quoted in the text, supra, pp. 238–239.

The Board did not, as petitioner contends (Br. 168), rest its decision upon any "vague presumption of 'continuance'." It did not, that is, having found certain conditions to have existed in the past, merely assume that those conditions continued to exist without any further proof. The Board specifically stated that "the record contains ample post-Act evidence which, when illuminated, supports our finding" (R. 130 [2039]).

This post-Act evidence is far from being as "scanty" (Br. 168) as petitioner would have it. The fact that it requires three pages of petitioner's brief (Br. 163–166) merely to itemize the post-Act evidence whose insufficiency it insists upon is convincing proof to the contrary. Neither is this evidence "absurdly irrelevant and immaterial" (Br. 166), as petitioner suggests. Petitioner recognizes, for example, that the "nondeviation" evidence relates to the post-Act period quite as much as to the preceding thirty years of its history (Br. 165). It does not avail for petitioner to brush this aside on the ground that all the nondeviation evidence is "irrelevant" (ibid.). We have already shown that such evidence is far from irrelevant (supra, pp. 139–140, 224–230). Nor can petitioner, by castigating some of the witnesses who gave post-Act testimony as "informers" and "provocateurs", and disparaging their testimony as "discredited" (Br. 164), expunge their testimony from the record. See infra, pp. 244–245, 251–257. Assaying the credibility of witnesses was the Board's function.

Neither is petitioner's argument aided, to cite but one more example, by its including among the "scanty" and "irrelevant" items of post-Act evidence the fact that "some of [its] present officials held positions in the Communist International prior to 1940, and visited and, in some cases, studied in the Soviet Union before 1940" (Br. 164). The evidence to which petitioner refers is expressed more pointedly in the language of the Report (R. 20 [1840]):

> We further find that a substantial number of [petitioner's] present leaders, including Foster, Stachel, Bittelman, Green, Winter, > and Williamson, have been to the Soviet Union on numerous occasions on Party business and have been indoctrinated and trained in the Soviet Union on Russian strategy and policies. These leaders have taught in Party schools, written for the Party press, and spoken at Party meetings, on various phases of Marxism-Leninism, including the leading position of the Soviet Union, the concept of proletarian internationalism, and the necessity of revolutionary overthrow of imperialist nations, particularly the United States. We find that Foster and these other leaders of [petitioner] have accepted the views and policies of the Soviet Union and have carried such views and policies into [petitioner], making them the views and policies of [petitioner].

Petitioner's argument that the post-Act evidence is of but trifling significance is further refuted by the fact that of the 507 government exhibits admitted in evidence, 56 post-dated the Act and were extensively used as the evidential bases of many particular findings in the Board's Report.[78] Five of the 19 former members of petitioner who testified for the Government were members during the post-Act period, several as late as 1952 (see R. 134–135 [2045–2048]); and all of these testified extensively concerning the post-Act period. Six others were members up until a time—1949 or 1950—immediately preceding passage of the Act (ibid.). Not one of these witnesses indicated that petitioner's character and nature had undergone any change in the post-Act period. Their testimony was, rather, entirely to the contrary. Petitioner's own witnesses, as petitioner itself points out, similarly insisted that the Party was the same sort of organization at the time of their testifying as it had always been, or at least as it had been since they came to know its innermost workings as members of its National Committee, which was in 1938 in the case of Miss Flynn and 1945 in the case of Gates (see Br. 167–168, including fn. 96). Petitioner does not even now claim to have changed its essential character and nature since the Act became law. Its whole position in this case has been that it has never been—or at least that it has not been since 1940—an organization of the type this Act defines."[9] The Government's evidence overwhelmingly established the contrary—that the petitioner was and is such an organization.

A theme which recurs throughout petitioner's brief, but which it states with particular emphasis in the present context, is that the Board paid too little heed to the testimony of its witnesses Flynn and Gates. After pointing out that these witnesses gave testimony which in large measure amounted to bland conclusory denials that petitioner does any of the things referred to in § 12 (e) of the Act (Br. 167–168), petitioner complains that the Board "dismissed this uncontradicted testimony with the bald statement that it did not establish the facts 'to our satisfaction' " (Br. 168). The Board, however, set forth in its Report the considerations which it took into account in weighing the testimony of these witnesses (R. 3 [1808]), as well as the factors which it took into account in weighing the contrary testimony of the Attorney General's witnesses (ibid.). It was for the Board to weigh this testimony, as it did, in the light of the whole record and to make findings according to the preponderance of the probative evidence of record. The Board's conclusion that petitioner's witnesses did not establish that petitioner's character and objectives had changed since the passage of the Act (R. 130 [2038]) was fully supported by the record. Moreover, as the Board found, "the record contains ample post-Act evidence which, when illuminated, supports our finding" (ibid.).

[9] Indeed, even if the record showed sudden protestations of reform upon the passage of the Act, United States v. Oregon Medical Society, 343 U. S. 326, teaches that such protestations should be scrutinized with care before being accepted at face value. "When defendants are shown to have settled into a continuing practice or entered into a conspiracy violative of antitrust laws," the Court said, "courts will not assume that it has been abandoned without clear proof. * * * It is the duty of the courts to beware of efforts to defeat injunctive relief by protestations of repentance and reform, especially when abandonment seems timed to anticipate suit, and there is probability of resumption" (id. at 333). See also Independent Employees Assn. v. National Labor Relations Board, 158 F. 2d 448, 455 (C. A. 2), certiorari denied, 333 U. S. 826.

Petitioner contends (Br. 193–199) that the Board erred in finding from the evidence before it that "there exists a world Communist movement substantially as described in Section 2 of the Act" (Br. 193; R. 9 [1819]). This contention is based, however, as petitioner recognizes (Br. 194, 199), on the assumption that the existence of a world Communist movement as found by Congress in § 2 of the Act, and having the characteristics described in that section, was subject to redetermination in the administrative proceeding before the Board. We argued above that this assumption is untenable—the existence of this world movement is one of the legislative facts found by Congress in the Act itself (supra, pp. 126–127). In that connection, we answered petitioner's contention that the making of this finding by Congress renders the Act unconstitutional as "fiat legislation" (supra, pp. 123–129). The court below was correct, therefore, in stating that it was unnecessary to redetermine the existence of what Congress had found in the Act to exist (Op. 56, R. 2133). Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, 529; Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 535–536.

The Board, it is true, deemed it "desirable" to make an independent finding, "based upon the evidence in this proceeding," concerning "the world Communist movement, its characteristics and the identification of the leadership of such movement" (R. 4 [1810]). Accordingly, it reviewed such evidence (R. 4–9 [1810–1819]) and found on the basis of it that there exists such a world movement, substantially as described in § 2 (R. 9 [1819]). Similarly, the court below, notwithstanding its holding that it was unnecessary to redetermine the existence of this movement, undertook, because the Board had made such an independent finding, to review the evidence (Op. 56–61, R. 2133–2138), and concluded that the finding was "supported by a clear preponderance of the evidence" (Op. 61, R. 2138). We submit that this conclusion is correct.

The evidence established far more than the presence of what petitioner describes as "Communist parties in various countries which base their program and activities on a common economic and political outlook, and work toward the ultimate achievement of a common social goal—a universal, classless, stateless society" (Br. 199). Petitioner's assertion that all that the court below found was that there is a world Communist movement in that sense (ibid.) is a serious distortion of what the court actually found the evidence to show. The court, while observing that the professed "ultimate objective" of the world Communist movement is a world-wide "classless, stateless society" (Op. 60, R. 2137), observed also that "[i]n the interim the program calls for a small, hard core of revolutionaries, formed into a disciplined Party in every country;" that "[t]his Party is to attain control of the government of its country for the purpose of destroying its present form;" and that "[i]n this interim operation the Party must be ruthless" (ibid.).

What this "ruthlessness" is to consist of is also described by the court. In the achievement of the "dictatorship of the proletariat," the court stated, Stalin, the heir of Lenin and the recognized leader of the world movement until his death, "stressed the necessity for violence" (Op. 57, R. 2134). The court quoted Stalin's statement in his Foundations of Leninism (A. G. Ex. 121, R. 1427, at 1434) to the effect that Lenin was "right in saying" that the "proletarian revolution" would be "impossible without the forcible destruction of the bourgeois state machine and the substitution for it of a new one * * *" (Op. 58, R. 2135). The court then proceeded to quote passages from other authoritative works among the classics of world Communism (Op. 58–60, R. 2135–2137), all in evidence in this case, and all tending to prove beyond a doubt that the world Communist movement is indeed, substantially, as § 2 of the Act describes it, "a world-wide revolutionary movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization."

Petitioner assumes that, because its witness Aptheker testified that a "dictatorship of the proletariat" would be, and as practiced in the Soviet Union is, democratic government in its purest form (see R. 1266–1267, 1306–1309, 1310),[80] the Board was bound to accept his testimony and to make findings with respect to this objective of the world Communist movement which would in effect adopt his views (Br. 196–198). The Board, however, was under no such compulsion, particularly when it had before it the following more authoritative views as to what the dictatorship of the proletariat is, how it should arise, and how it should operate in practice (Stalin, Problems of Leninism, A. G. Ex. 138, R. 1500, at 1505–1507):[81]

> "In order to win the majority of the population to its side," Lenin continues, "the proletariat must first of all overthrow

[80] Among other things Aptheker testified that freedom of religion and of the press is enjoyed in the Soviet Union (R. 1308). He stated that when Communists succeed in getting control of a country opposing political parties are allowed to continue to exist and publicize their views as long as "different classes" continue to exist (R. 1306); that, indeed, when the Communist Party gets into a position of leadership in a country it willingly shares its leadership with other parties (ibid.).

[81] This work was described by witness Meyer as one of the "central" textbooks used in Communist Party schools in the United States (R. 689; see Report of the Board, R. 43 [1880–1881], fn. 30). Though written in 1926 (Br. 198, fn. 116), the English translation was first published in the United States in 1934 (R. 1500). It was one of the "classics" studied by witness Lautner at the Party's National Training School in 1941 (R. 943–944, 946, 949) and used by him as a textbook and sourcebook when he himself became a teacher in the Party's schools from 1947 till his expulsion in 1950 (R. 950–952).

the bourgeoisie and seize state power and, secondly, it must introduce Soviet rule, smash to pieces the old state apparatus, and thus at one blow undermine the rule, authority and influence of the bourgeoisie and of the petty-bourgeoisie compromisers in the ranks of the non-proletarian toiling masses. * * * * * *

Such are the characteristic symptoms of the proletarian revolution.

* * * * *

Replying to those who confuse the dictatorship of the proletariat with "popular," "elected" and "non-class" government, Lenin states:

"The class which has seized political power has done so conscious of the fact that it has seized power alone. This is implicit in the concept of the dictatorship of the proletariat. This concept has meaning only when one class knows that it alone takes political power into its own hands, and does not deceive itself or others by talk about popular, elected government, sanctified by the whole people." * * *

* * * * *

Pointing to one of the most important aims of the dictatorship, namely the suppression of the exploiters, Lenin states:

"The scientific concept, dictatorship, means nothing more nor less than power which directly rests on violence, which is not limited by any laws or restricted by any absolute rules * * *. Dictatorship > means—note this once and for all, Messrs. Cadets [ed. note: "The Constitutional Democrats"]—unlimited power, resting on violence and not on law. * * *" * * *

In short, the record amply supports the Board's conclusion that there exists a world Communist movement substantially as described in § 2 of the Act.

C. THE BOARD'S FINDINGS ARE SUPPORTED BY RELEVANT, COMPETENT EVIDENCE

In a further attack on the findings of the Board, petitioner, at pages 199–211 of its brief, makes an intemperate attack on the Attorney General's witnesses as "discredited," and charges that the Board's findings are based on a "misrepresentation of the evidence." Petitioner's charges, which touch relatively minor aspects of the proof, are insubstantial and in many instances distort the record, as is apparent when the materials alleged to support its assertions are examined.

Petitioner concentrates its attack on the use by the Attorney General of informers. Of the twenty-two witnesses who testified for the Attorney General, nineteen were former members of petitioner and nine had joined or rejoined petitioner as the result of conferences with the F. B. I. (R. 134–136 [2045–2048]). As this Court has noted, the use of informers involves issues of credibility, not of law. There is no policy or rule of evidence which forecloses use by the Government of otherwise relevant evidence supplied by informers, false friends, or the like. On Lee v. United States, 343 U. S. 747, 756–758; Caminetti v. United States, 242 U. S. 470, 495–496; United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201, 224–225 (C. A. 2), affirmed, 341 U. S. 494. The reason for the rule is illustrated by the requirements of public policy in a case such as this where the petitioner is an organization which endeavors to operate covertly and, in the nature of things, the available witnesses are persons who were formerly members of that organization.[82]

Issues of credibility are uniquely issues to be resolved by the triers of fact who have the advantage of hearing the witnesses and observing their demeanor while testifying on both direct and cross examination. The record shows that all of the Attorney General's witnesses were subjected to extensive and searching cross examination on matters going both to the substance of their testimony and to issues of credibility. Petitioner urged before the panel its objections to the character of certain of these witnesses, and renewed these objections in its exceptions to the recommended report, in its brief to the Board, and on oral argument before the Board.[83] The report of the Board makes it clear that it carefully weighed, as was its duty, these contentions. Thus the Board explicitly stated (R. 3 [1808]):

> In making our findings herein, we have considered and weighed all the evidence of record. In weighing Petitioner's [i. e., the Attorney General's] evidence, we have considered that certain of its witnesses fall into the category of "informers" and we have scrutinized their testimony accordingly; we have considered and resolved the inconsistencies in the testimony of certain of Petitioner's witnesses; we have considered the testimony of Petitioner's witnesses against the background of their various organizational positions and activities in the CPUSA which afforded the sources of their knowledge; and we have had the benefit of the Panel's observation of their demeanor while testifying. Viewing these considerations in the light of the whole record, we find no basis for disregarding the substance of their testimony.
> We have likewise weighed and evaluated Respondent's evidence, taking into account that each of its three witnesses has a vital personal interest in the outcome of this > proceeding; that in nature and substance the direct testimony of two of its witnesses amounted, in a large degree, to conclusory denials of the allegations of the petition and the criteria of Section 13 (e) of the Act; that important members of Respondent, whom Petitioner's witnesses had identified as being parties to, or present at, conversations which were detrimental to Respondent herein, were not called to rebut such testimony; and, that the Hearing Panel, having observed the demeanor of its witnesses as they testified, had some misgivings about certain of them.

[83] We deal infra, pp. 277–285, with the issues raised by petitioner with respect to the testimony of Crouch, Johnson and Matusow. As we there point out, there is no reasonable possibility that the Board's ultimate findings of fact would be different even if the testimony of these witnesses were completely ignored.

Petitioner gives copious citations to the record which, it intimates, support the charges it makes. A few examples will demonstrate with what caution petitioner's assertion of record support must be evaluated. In some instances, the citations do not support the assertions made; in others, petitioner has failed to cite other portions of the record which are necessary to an evaluation of the incidents to which reference is made.

Thus petitioner, in its general attack on the asserted low morals of certain of the witnesses, states that they informed on relatives and friends and on persons whom they, "while agents of the F. B. I.," had induced to join petitioner (Br. 201). But petitioner fails to note that these same witnesses testified that recruiting was a task required of them by the Party (Markward, R.

751–752; Cummings, Tr. 11011, 11013); that they never recruited Party members at the request or suggestion of the F. B. I. (Markward, R. 751; Cummings, Tr. 11011–11014; and cf. Tr. 10982–10983, 10990–10991); and that in each instance the F. B. I. was informed of the circumstances surrounding the joining of the Party by the individuals concerned (Markward, Tr. 7814; Cummings, Tr. 11011, 11014).

An analysis of petitioner's attack on the Board's finding that its disaffiliation from the Communist International in November 1940, "did not alter in any substantive way" petitioner's relationship with the International (Br. 202–203) will illustrate the insubstantial nature of petitioner's further attack on specific findings of the Board. Petitioner states that the "only evidence" which can support this finding was testimony by Crouch (Br. 202). But, as appears from the Board's report, it relied also on testimony of Meyer and Lautner (R. 14 [1828–1829]). Petitioner charges that the Board ignored the testimony of its witness Miss Flynn on this point (Br. 203). But, on the contrary, at R. 14 [1829], the Board quoted Miss Flynn's testimony on cross-examination to the effect that "we were not disaffiliating in anger * * *. It was, you might say, a friendly divorce." The Board did not ignore, but evaluated Miss Flynn's testimony. Moreover, petitioner fails to invite the Court's attention to the fact that, as observed by the court below

(Op. 64, R. 2141), petitioner's disaffiliation from the Communist International was, by its own formal admission, "for the specific purpose of removing itself from the terms of" the then recently enacted Voorhis Act (C. P. Ex. 13, p. 50). This, of course, was highly relevant to the question whether the purported disaffiliation constituted a termination of relations in fact, or whether it was a sham maneuver. We do not stop to discuss petitioner's assertion that the report "conceals" the fact that Crouch had never previously testified to a certain statement of Browder on this matter (Br. 203), for there was no showing that Crouch's past silence on the point occurred under circumstances requiring that such testimony be given (see Tr. 5543–5601). Petitioner's final assertion that Crouch's testimony was directly contradicted by that of Lautner (Br. 203) is not sustained by the record. On the contrary, Lautner testified that the Party's decision to disaffiliate from the International would "in no way affect the question of proletariat internationalism, proletariat solidarity and fraternal relationship between the parties" (R. 991). Even petitioner's witness, Miss Flynn, while denying that Browder had said that the Party's relations with the International "would remain exactly as in the past," did testify that Browder had "said something that might be misinterpreted or deliberately perverted to mean something like that" (R. 1285).

In short, petitioner's attack on the Board's witnesses and on certain minor aspects of the proof is misleading in its use of the record and is in toto insubstantial when weighed against the overwhelming proof that, as the Board found and the Court of Appeals affirmed, petitioner is a Communist-action organization. The fact that the Board, by and large, resolved factual conflicts in favor of the Attorney General and rejected the contrary testimony of petitioner's witnesses reflects the character of the proof adduced, and does not, as petitioner would have it (Br. 210–211), impugn the integrity or competence of the Board. National Labor Relations Board v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U. S. 656, 658–660; United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 338 U. S. 338, 340–341.

D. THE COURT BELOW CORRECTLY AFFIRMED THE BOARD'S ORDER, NOTWITHSTANDING THE FACT THAT IT MODIFIED TWO OF THE SUBSIDIARY FINDINGS OF THE BOARD

Petitioner contends (Br. 175–177) that "the court below, having invalidated key findings of the Board, erred in not remanding the case for administrative redetermination" (Br. 175). Petitioner asserts that the court below "struck" (Br. 175) "two of the key findings" (Br. 176) and held that the Board had given "an erroneous application" to a third (ibid.), so that there were only "five findings which survived" (Br. 177).

At the outset, the nature of the rulings of the court referred to by petitioner should be understood. With respect to the Board's subsidiary finding (corresponding to § 13 (e) (5) of the Act) to the effect that petitioner "reports to the Soviet Union and its representatives" (R. 98 [1982]), the Court of Appeals said (Op. 72, R. 2149):

> * * * There is little doubt about these reports having been made when the Party was a member of the International; such was one of the "conditions" of the International. There is some doubt that a preponderance of the evidence supports the broad conclusion that the Party "reports to the Soviet Union and its representatives." Such a conclusion seems to imply constant, systematic reporting as of now. The evidence indicates instances, as in the cases of Eisler and Peters. On this record we would strike this finding as phrased. There is a preponderance of evidence, we think, to support a conclusion that upon occasion leaders of the Party report to representatives of the Soviet Union.

The other "key finding" of the Board to which petitioner refers was its subsidiary finding relating to "secret practices" of petitioner (corresponding to § 13 (e) (7)). After reviewing the long history of such practice (R. 105–116 [1993–2012]) and after considering the evidence relating to their "purpose" (R. 116–117 [2012–2015]), the Board concluded that (R. 117 [2015]):

> * * * the secret practices undertaken by [petitioner] are for the purpose of concealing the true nature of the Party and promoting its objectives. We cannot accept [petitioner's] contention that its secret practices are merely devices utilized to protect the rights and liberties of its members.

With respect to this finding the Court of Appeals said (Op. 73–74, R. 2150–2151):

> This question, whether the secret practices of the Party are for the purpose of protecting the liberties of the members or are for the purpose of promoting the objectives of the Party, is a nebulous one. The two purposes may well overlap. In so far as protection of its members from public identification as Communists also promotes the objectives of the Party, both purposes could exist together. In a doubtful situation such as that on this point, we strike the finding as to purpose. At the same time we are of opinion that the Party's view of the limited purpose of secrecy is not shown by a preponderance of the evidence. On this point we conclude simply that a defined purpose is not proven.

Petitioner's further assertion that the court below held that the Board had given "an erroneous application" to the non-deviation finding (Br. 175–176) is, as we have previously pointed out (supra, pp. 226–227, fn. 68), without record support.

It thus appears, contrary to petitioner's assertions, that the court below modified two of the Board's subsidiary findings, while affirming the other six as "supported by a preponderance of the evidence" (Op. 76, R. 2153). And, what is decisive here, the court below further found that the Board's ultimate finding of fact—that petitioner "is substantially directed, dominated, and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement * * *; and * * * operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement" (R. 132 [2042])—was likewise itself fully supported by the preponderance of the evidence (Op. 75-76, R. 2152–2153).

As we have seen (supra, pp. 132–133), the statutory considerations of § 13 (e) are in no sense tests or criteria, the fulfillment of any one of which would suffice to establish that an organization met the Act's definition of a Communist-action group. It would be equally erroneous, however, to assume that the Act requires affirmative findings under each of the § 13 (e) categories before an organization can be held to fulfill the § 3 (3) definition of a Communist-action group. Section 13 (e) simply establishes certain categories of proof which Congress identified as relevant to the decisive issue presented by the § 3 (3) definition. Here, the subsidiary findings which the court below affirmed as established by a preponderance of evidence, together with the other findings as modified, abundantly supported the ultimate and controlling finding that petitioner is a Communist-action organization, pursuant to which the Board ordered it to register under the Act. Under the circumstances, remand of the case to the Board for redetermination of that issue was not required and would have served no useful purpose. The court below correctly affirmed the Board's order. National Labor Relations Board v. Newport News Co., 308 U. S. 241, 247; National Labor Relations Board v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F. 2d 131 (C. A. 1), certiorari denied, 346 U. S. 887; Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co. v. Federal Power Commission, 169 F. 2d 881, 883 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 335 U. S. 854. [84] The cases relied on by petitioner (Br. 176–177) are distinguishable from the case at bar. This is not a case in which it is unclear from the record on just what evidence the administrative findings are based (National Labor Relations Board v. Virginia Electric & Power Co., 314 U. S. 469, 479); nor one in which the administrative order would be sustainable if based on grounds which the record shows were not the actual grounds on which it was based (Securities and Ex-

PETITIONER WAS NOT DENIED A FAIR HEARING BEFORE THE BOARD

Petitioner contends that it was denied a fair hearing before the Board because of alleged "extra-legal pressures" on it on the part of the Senate Judiciary Committee to decide against petitioner (Br. 178–183) and because of alleged prejudice against it on the part of the two members of the hearing panel which heard the evidence and made the recommended decision (Br. 183–185). We submit that the contention is without merit in either respect.

A. THERE IS NO EVIDENCE THAT THE BOARD WAS SUBJECTED TO "EXTRA-LEGAL PRESSURES" ON THE PART OF THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OR ITS CHAIRMAN

On April 23, 1951, a hearing panel, consisting of three members of the Board, commenced the taking of testimony in this case. The members of this panel, Messrs. LaFollette and Brown and Dr. McHale (as well as the other two members of the Board, Chairman Richardson and Mr. Coddaire) were at that time serving under recess ap-change Commission v. Chenery Corp., 318 U. S. 80, 94–95); nor one in which the reviewing court modified an administrative order (Federal Power Commission v. Idaho Power Co., 344 U. S. 17, 20–21); nor one in which the administrative findings are "so shrouded in doubt" that the basis of the agency's action is not determinable (Colorado-Wyoming Gas Co. v. Federal Power Commission, 324 U. S. 626, 634–635).

pointments (see infra, pp. 285–307). On June 6, 1951, Chairman Richardson resigned from the Board because of ill health (First Annual Report, Subversive Activities Control Board, p. 5). On July 30, 1951, the Senate Judiciary Committee, which had the remaining nominations under consideration, reported favorably on the nominations of Brown, McHale, and Coddaire, but took no action on that of Mr. LaFollette, the chairman of the panel. The three nominees reported on favorably were confirmed by the Senate ten days later, on August 9, 1951 (97 Cong. Rec. 9702). The LaFollette nomination died in committee and his recess appointment expired with the adjournment of the First Session of the 82d Congress on October 20, 1951, at which time Mr. LaFollette ceased to serve (R. 1). The hearing continued before the remaining two members of the panel, Brown and McHale, ending July 1, 1952 (R. 1, 2).

Based upon the foregoing facts, petitioner argues that "for many months during the pendency of the administrative proceeding,[85] the tenure of the Board members was subject to the pleasure of the Senate Judiciary Committee, whose chairman [Senator McCarran] had the power to block confirmation if their conduct of the proceeding did not conform to his wishes" (Br. 179). Because of this, petitioner argues, the members were necessarily influenced by fear of nonconfirmation and the consequent loss of their positions during the period prior to July 30, 1951, when the Senate Committee reported favorably on their nominations.

Preliminarily, it should be observed that, since the hearings did not end until July 1, 1952 (R. 2), nearly a year following the favorable report by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and since the recommended decision of the hearing panel was not issued until October 20, 1952 (R. 2), four months after that, and since the final order of the Board was not entered until April 20, 1953 (R. 138), six months later still, it is difficult to understand how, even given petitioner's assumptions, the alleged pressure emanating from the Senate Judiciary Committee and its chairman could be said to have affected the decision and order of the Board, which alone is in issue here.

Basically, petitioner's argument consists of an indictment of recess appointments as such. In every case in which the President requests an official to perform statutory duties without prior Senate confirmation of his appointment, the appointee is in the identical position of the Board members in this case. Yet Article II, Section 2, Clause 3 of the Constitution makes specific provision for recess appointments. It is apparent that the drafters of the Constitution must have considered that on balance it was preferable to have an officer serve before confirmation rather than to require that a position remain vacant whenever the Senate was in recess and therefore not able to pass upon the appointment promptly. It can do the petitioner no good to quarrel with that decision; it is written into the Constitution.

To buttress its argument, petitioner argues not only that members of the Board were in a position where influence might have been exerted, but that it was in fact exerted. This, however, finds no support in the record. There is no evidence that the Senate Judiciary Committee, its chairman, or any of its members attempted to apply pressure to the Board. No action by any member of the Board gives evidence that he was acting under duress or that he was ready to compromise his oath of office because of fear that he might not please Congress.

This Court is asked to pile inference on inference to impute dishonesty to both the Senate Judiciary Committee and the Board. This the courts have refused to do. Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. 683, 700–703; United States v. Morgan, 313 U. S. 409, 420–421; Marquette Cement Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 147 F. 2d 589 (C. A. 7);

National Labor Relations Board v. Weirton Steel Co., 135 F. 2d 494, 497–498 (C. A. 3); Donnelly Garment Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 123 F. 2d 215 (C. A. 8); National Labor Relations Board v. Air Associates, 121 F. 2d 586, 588–591 (C. A. 2); Press Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 118 F. 2d 937, 940 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 313 U. S. 595. On the contrary, courts have indulged the presumption that administrators are "men of conscience and intellectual discipline, capable of judging a particular controversy fairly on the basis of its own circumstances" (United States v. Morgan, supra, 313 U. S. at 421), and that they can resist any unfair attitudes expressed to them. National Labor Relations Board v. Air Associates, supra, 121 F. 2d at 588.

Petitioner points to testimony that, before the members' confirmation, three of the Attorney General's witnesses had had conversations with a Mr. Mandel, a former member of the Communist Party (R. 300), who was then employed by the subcommittee on Internal Security of the Senate Judiciary Committee (Br. 180–181). Gitlow had been a personal friend of Mandel's for nearly thirty years (R. 300); he testified that whenever he came to Washington he discussed matters of mutual interest with him (R. 295). Kornfeder had likewise known Mandel for thirty years (R. 347). Crouch too had known Mandel from their Party days (Tr. 5798–5799). During Gitlow's testimony, panel chairman LaFollette questioned him as to whether he had discussed with Mandel the conduct of members of the panel (R. 295). Gitlow replied that he "would have discussed it with him" as a matter of course "because he is a friend of mine, over a long period of time, interested in the matters that I am interested in" (ibid.). A short while later in the hearing Mr. LaFollette stated that he resented the fact that the witness had discussed his conduct in the hearing room with Mandel; that it made him feel as if he were an elected "nisi prius judge" whose renomination was subject to the control of a "political boss". He added, however, that he realized that the fact of the conversations between the witness and Mandel did not "necessarily prove" that "there was an attempt by this device to intimidate me", and he stated that, in any event, the incident would not affect his conduct of the hearing and the carrying out of his "sworn * * * duty". He emphasized that he was speaking for himself only and that his "personal feelings" should not be imputed to his colleagues on the panel (R. 297–298). Later in the hearing, when an attempt was made to discover whether witness Kornfeder had also talked to Mandel about the panel members, Mr. LaFollette stated that, while he did not "retract from" his interrogation of Gitlow on that subject, he thought that that line of questioning had been incorrect, and so he ruled against further pursuit of the subject (R. 347).

It is surely bare speculation to build from conversations between witnesses and a friend of thirty years' standing, who was employed by a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, an attempt by the Judiciary Committee itself to intimidate Board members. The conduct of the members of the hearing panel as they conducted a proceeding then in progress was certainly a natural subject of conversation. As Gitlow said, he "would have discussed it" with Mandel as a matter of course "because he is a friend of mine" (R. 295). Mr. LaFollette himself, as we have seen, appreciated that the fact of these conversations was not proof of any attempt to intimidate him, and what is equally important, he observed that in any event he was not intimidated, and would continue to perform his sworn duty to conduct the hearings in an impartial manner. There is no indication whatever in this record of any word or act on the part either of Mandel, whom petitioner gratuitously describes as "McCarran's agent" (Br. 182), or of any committee member, designed to intimidate any member of the Board. Certainly, there is nothing in all this to show that any Board member was intimidated.[38]

[38] The statement of Mr. LaFollette which petitioner quotes at Br. 182–183 does not, when read in context, bear out petitioner's contention. Petitioner attaches a different Petitioner has made no showing of prejudice which would invalidate the carefully considered order of the Board entered nearly two years after the members' final confirmation. Particularly is this so in view of the fact that judicial review of the Board's order was not limited to determining that there was some substantial evidence supporting it, but amounted in effect to de novo consideration of the evidence and the ascertainment that the order was supported by the preponderance of the evidence (see Op. 45, 75– meaning to the statement from that intended by Mr. LaFollette. The facts are as follows: One of the Attorney General's witnesses, Kornfeder, had been angered by charges and insinuations on the part of petitioner's counsel, Mr. Marcantonio, that he had committed certain crimes, and he had addressed certain remarks to Mr. Marcantonio (R. 341). Mr. LaFollette became provoked with the witness after a colloquy with him and referred to him as "contumacious" (R. 340–341). One of the counsel for the Attorney General thereupon made an apology in the witness's behalf, which Mr. LaFollette accepted (R. 341). A short while later, however, another colloquy occurred, in which Mr. LaFollette admonished the witness and stated that he would ask the Board to authorize him to request a contempt citation against the witness unless the latter apologized within two minutes (R. 342). Thereupon, another of the attorneys for the Attorney General attempted to apologize for the witness (ibid.). Mr. LaFollette then made an extended statement regarding the necessity of conducting an orderly hearing, in which he expressed the view that the panel had the power to order a contumacious witness from the hearing room and to strike his testimony from the record (R. 342–344). Panel member McHale stated that she concurred in Mr. LaFollette's statement (R. 344), but member Brown stated that,

B. PETITIONER'S MOTIONS TO DISQUALIFY MEMBERS McHALE AND BROWN FOR ALLEGED PERSONAL BIAS AND PREJUDICE WERE PROPERLY DENIED

Petitioner contends (Br. 183–185) that the Board erred in denying (R. 190–196, 209–211) its motions to disqualify members McHale (R. 187–190) and Brown (R. 196–199) for alleged bias and prejudice against it. The contention is without merit in either respect.

---

while he agreed that orderly procedure must be maintained at all times, he could not, in the light of all the circumstances, share Mr. LaFollette's views with regard to the conduct of the particular witness then testifying (R. 344). Evidently provoked at this, Mr. LaFollette on the following day sought to resign as chairman of the panel (R. 346). In doing so he made a statement, which included the excerpt quoted by petitioner, in which he referred to the dissent of Mr. Brown of the day before as the reason for his resignation (R. 345–346). Mr. LaFollette was nevertheless retained as chairman (R. 346–347), and, in fact, overruled petitioner's motion to discontinue further proceedings because of this incident (R. 347). If this incident has any pertinence to the instant argument, it is to show the independence of mind of the panel members.

1. With respect to member McHale

On November 15, 1951, during the pendency of the hearings in this case, panel member McHale made a short speech (R. 193–196) at a club luncheon (R. 191). In the speech Dr. McHale referred briefly to the history of the Subversive Activities Control Act and the function of the Board as provided for in the Act, summarized the Act's registration provisions and the contents of the Attorney General's petition in this case, mentioned the number of exhibits thus far filed and the number of pages of testimony thus far taken, pointed out that the hearings were open to the public, and invited the members of her audience to attend (R. 191–192, 193–196). On the basis of this speech, petitioner moved that Dr. McHale be disqualified from further participation in the case on the ground that she had prejudged the issues (R. 187–190). The Board denied the motion (R. 190–192) on the ground that the speech, a copy of which appears in the record at R. 193–196, "fails to indicate bias, prejudice or prejudgment" (R. 192). The Board's memorandum opinion stated that the affidavit of bias and prejudice (R. 187–190) attached to petitioner's motion "consists of extracting expressions from Dr. McHale's speech and importing to them a meaning which, in our opinion, is unjustified when such words are read in the context of the speech as a whole" (R. 192). We submit that this action was correct.

Dr. McHale's reference in her speech to the Hitler-Stalin Pact (R. 193–194), which petitioner claims involved a prejudgment of the issue of "non-deviation" (Br. 183), was merely an explanation of what had moved Congress to act, not an explanation of her own belief. Her references to legislative facts incorporated in § 2 of the Act (e. g., the congressional finding that a world Communist movement exists (R. 194)), and to the contents of the pleadings (R. 195), as well as her explanation of the then present status of the case (R. 195–196) and of the consequences of an order directing an organization to register (R. 196), are a neutral account of publicly known facts. Her statement, "What the outcome will be is anyone's guess" (R. 196), scarcely shows prejudgment of the issues, and her reflection to the effect that "catch[ing] the rabbit" is necessary before one may have "rabbit stew" (R. 196) involved at most an observation that before petitioner could be ordered to register there had to be clear proof that it was a Communist-action organization as defined in the Act. This statement was admittedly true, and the fact that it was couched as a figure of speech does not establish that Dr. McHale did not consider such proof necessary. On the other hand, she doubtless felt that her audience might need to be reminded that the Act required proof that the "Communist Party" was a "Communist organization". There is no warrant for petitioner's contention that this statement by Dr. McHale "indicated her view that the hearing was merely a formality" (Br. 183).

Dr. McHale thus was not shown on the basis of her remarks to have been biased against petitioner, so as to be unable to accord it a fair hearing. Although each case must be decided on its own merits, we submit that the situation at bar does not approach that considered by this Court in the last Morgan case (United States v. Morgan, 313 U. S. 409), where, notwithstanding the "strong views" expressed by the Secretary of Agriculture in his letter criticizing the earlier adverse decision of this Court, it was stated at page 421:

> But, intrinsically, the letter did not require the Secretary's dignified denial of bias. That he not merely held, but expressed, strong views on matters believed by him to have been in issue, did not unfit him for exercising his duty in subsequent proceedings ordered by this Court. As well might it be argued that the judges below, who had three times heard this case, had disqualifying convictions. In publicly criticizing this Court's opinion the Secretary merely indulged in a practice familiar in the long history of Anglo-Amer> ican litigation, whereby unsuccessful litigants and lawyers give vent to their disappointment in tavern or press. Cabinet officers charged by Congress with adjudicatory functions are not assumed to be flabby creatures any more than judges are. Both may have an underlying philosophy in approaching a specific case. But both are assumed to be men of conscience and intellectual discipline, capable of judging a particular controversy fairly on the basis of its own circumstances. Nothing in this record disturbs such an assumption.

Moreover, Dr. McHale was but one member of a unanimous Board which made its findings on the basis of overwhelming testimonial and documentary evidence and which issued a report carefully detailing that evidence. Even were petitioner's assumptions correct, therefore, they would hardly be material. Furthermore, what we said above (supra, pp. 269–270) applies with equal pertinency here. That is, the fact that the judicial review of the Board's findings by the court below—to which petitioner imputes no bias—amounted in effect to de novo consideration of the evidence and led to its decision that the Board's order was supported by a preponderance of that evidence (see Op. 49, 75–76, R. 2126, 2152–2153; cf. cases cited supra, p. 270) makes the question of Dr. McHale's freedom from bias irrelevant at this time.

2. With respect to member Brown

Board member Brown, as we have said, was one of the members of the hearing panel which heard the evidence and issued the recommended decision. The hearings ended on July 1, 1952 (R. 2), and panel members Brown and McHale issued their findings of fact and recommended decision on October 20, 1952 (R. 2). On November 16, 1952, more than four months after the taking of evidence had been concluded, and approximately one month after he and Dr. McHale had issued their findings and recommended decision, Brown appeared as a guest on a television-radio program (R. 206).

During this program, Brown summarized briefly the provisions of the Act administered by the Board, described the functions of the Board and the issues in the present proceeding, and related several of the findings contained in the recommended decision which he and Dr. McHale had issued (R. 207). He stated that a definite showing had been made under each of the eight evidentiary heads provided in the Act for the determination of a Communist-action organization, and announced his belief that petitioner would appeal from the Board's decision in the event that the Board should accept the panel's recommended decision and order petitioner to register (R. 207–208). He stated, in referring to the hearing panel's findings of fact and recommended decision, that this was the first time that petitioner had been labeled for what it was, an instrumentality of a foreign government, and, in alluding to specific findings in the recommended decision, he related, in accordance with those findings, that petitioner had not deviated in its positions from those of the Soviet Union (R. 208). He stated specifically during the program that he could not speak for the Board, which had to make the ultimate decision in the case (R. 208).

Petitioner, on the basis of Brown's appearance and statements in the television-radio program as above described, moved that he be disqualified from further participation in the case (R. 196–198). The Board, after the filing of an affidavit by Brown (R. 206–208) in which he gave the details of his appearance and statements as above summarized, denied the motion (R. 209–211), observing, inter alia, that the program in question took place after Brown and Dr. McHale had issued their recommended decision (R. 210). We submit that this denial was correct. It scarcely amounts to bias and prejudice for Mr. Brown to have repeated publicly what he had already made a matter of record—that on the evidence he had heard he believed petitioner to be a Communist-action organization within the meaning of the Act. He simply repeated the substance of the panel's findings already made and published. Petitioner's argumentative characterization of

Mr. Brown's remarks (see Br. 183) is unwarranted. An expression of judgment on the basis of evidence already in and already evaluated does not show bias, and is not comparable to the general expressions of opinion announced before evidence was taken in Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute; 333 U. S. 683, 700–703, which this Court nevertheless held did not preclude the members of the Commission from hearing the evidence with open minds.[87]

THE COURT OF APPEALS DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN DENYING PETITIONER'S MOTION FOR LEAVE TO ADDUCE ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE BEFORE THE BOARD

Petitioner contends (Br. 212–216) that the court below erred in denying (R. 2077) its motion (R. 2053–2055) for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board. The pertinent facts are as follows:

On August 11, 1954, while the case was pending before the Court of Appeals following submission on briefs and oral argument but before the rear-

[87] See also our observations, made with respect to the alleged bias of Dr. McHale (supra, p. 274), but having equal pertinency here, viz, that the question of one member's alleged bias loses relevance in the light of the unanimity of the Board's final findings and order, and the virtual de novo consideration given to those findings by the court below, which found them to be supported by the preponderance of the evidence.

gument (see supra, pp. 10–11), petitioner filed in the Court of Appeals a motion (R. 2053–2055) for leave to adduce additional evidence before the Board. The motion alleged that petitioner was in possession of newly discovered evidence that the testimony of three of the Government's witnesses (Paul Crouch, Manning Johnson, and Harvey Matusow), on which testimony the Board was alleged to have relied "extensively and heavily" in making its findings of fact, was perjurious (R. 2054). In a supporting affidavit (R. 2055–2064), it was pointed out that the Board, as reflected in its annotated Report, "supported its findings of fact with thirty-six separate references to the testimony of Crouch, twenty-five separate references to the testimony of Johnson and twenty-four separate references to the testimony of Matusow" (R. 2055). An appendix (R. 2065–2066) to the affidavit listed in tabular form the instances in which the Board made reference to the testimony of the witnesses in question and the subject-matter of the testimony in each instance. The affidavit recited a number of "illustrative" examples of "the importance which the [Board] attached to their testimony" (R. 2056). The balance of the affidavit (R. 2056–2064) was devoted to a statement of the reasons for the affiant's belief that the witnesses in question, all former members of the Communist Party, had testified falsely. The support for the motion consisted in substance of assertions that the three witnesses had testified falsely on other occasions (R. 2059–2064).

In a memorandum in opposition to the motion (R. 2067–2076), the Board stated that (R. 2070–2071):

> Contrary to the impression which the petitioner seeks to convey by its moving papers, the testimony of Paul Crouch, Manning Johnson, and Harvey Matusow was not of decisive importance at the hearing. Their testimony can be ignored in toto and the ultimate determination of the Board will remain amply supported by evidence both testimonial and documentary in character. The case presented by the Attorney General is supported by the testimony of twenty[88] witnesses and by more than four hundred and sixty documents. It is apparent from the record and from the Annotated Report of the Board that the result reached would be the same without the testimony of Crouch, Johnson, and Matusow.

The memorandum then proceeded to analyze the "illustrative examples" cited by petitioner as alleged proof of the importance of these three witnesses' testimony to the Board's findings (R. 2071–2074). On the basis of this analysis it was pointed out (R. 2071) that, with but one exception,[89]—

> * * * even these "illustrative" examples, which it is reasonable to assume constitute the petitioner's principal showing, are amply supported by other credible evidence of record * * *.[90]

Similarily, with reference to the tabular listing of the instances in which the Board had referred

[89] The single exception was Matusow's testimony regarding an instance of financial aid from the Soviet Union to petitioner in the year 1949 (R. 2074). It should be noted that the Board did not rely heavily on any of the "financial aid" evidence in reaching its ultimate factual conclusion that petitioner is a Communist-action organization (see fn. 65, supra, p. 217).

[90] It will suffice here to make specific reference to but one of the petitioner's "illustrative examples." According to petitioner, the Board "relied heavily on the testimony of Johnson for its findings that * * * the first and only allegiance of Communists is to the Soviet Union, and that in the event of war between the United States and the Soviet Union it would be the duty of every Communist to help defeat the United States" (R. 2056). As pointed out in the Board's reply memorandum, however, "In its Annotated Report, the Board devoted eighteen pages to the subject of allegiance, culminating in the finding that the leaders and members of the Communist Party 'consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their loyalty and obligations to the Soviet Union.' (Annotated Report, pp. 215–233 [R. 2016–2034]). This finding and the subsidiary findings pointed to by the petitioner are based upon extensive and varied testimonial and documentary evidence, as the briefest glance at the cited pages of the Annotated Report will show. That the contribution of Johnson's testimony is merely cumulative and corroborative and in no sense necessary to the findings cannot reasonably be disputed. It was not heavily relied on" (R. 2073).

For the other "illustrative examples" and the Board's analysis of them, see R. 2056, 2071–2074.

to the testimony of the witnesses in question (see p. 278, supra), the Board's memorandum pointed out that (R. 2075):

> Investigation of the individual references in the appendix demonstrates that in most instances they are accompanied by citations to the testimony of other witnesses and to documentary evidence in substantiation of the same point. In most instances, the citations to Crouch, Johnson, or Matusow could be stricken and ample authority would remain. * * * Beyond showing that the testimony of the three witnesses in question was used by the Board in its Report, the tabulation proves nothing.

The Board's memorandum concluded as follows (ibid.):

> It should be borne in mind that the conclusion of the Board that the petitioner is a Communist action organization, as defined in section 3 of the Internal Security Act of 1950, is arrived at on the basis of a number of subsidiary findings which comport with the criteria set forth in section 13 (e) of the Act. These subsidiary findings in turn depend upon a vast number of individual findings of fact. Were the testimony of Paul Crouch, Manning Johnson, and Harvey Matusow entirely absent from the record, a relative few of the myriad individual findings might be disturbed. The effect could be no greater.

> It is nonsense to maintain that the result would be in any way changed. The petitioner would still be found a Communist-action organization by overwhelming evidence. A hearing should not be reopened for the reception of evidence which could not change the result. National Labor Relations Board v. J. S. Popper, supra [113 F. 2d 602 (C. A. 3)]; cf. United States v. Thompson, supra [188 F. 2d 652 (C. A. D. C.)] [91]

On December 23, 1954, the motion for leave to adduce additional evidence was denied without opinion, in an order entered simultaneously with the judgment affirming the order of the Board (R. 2077).

Petitioner contends that the Court of Appeals' refusal to remand the cause to the Board for the adduction of additional evidence was a violation of § 14 (a) of the Act (Br. 212–216). Section 14 (a) provides in pertinent part:

> * * * If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evi> dence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board and to be adduced upon the proceeding in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. * * *

[91] It was also pointed out in the memorandum that, under the authorities, where alleged newly-discovered evidence relates solely "to the issue of credibility and not to any fact at issue," a hearing should not be reopened for its reception (R. 2068); and that each of the three witnesses in question had been cross-examined at length at the hearing before the Board, mostly on collateral matters (R. 2070). Hence, it was argued, "[f]urther evidence of a collateral nature and further cross-examination on collateral matters would be cumulative and would accomplish nothing" (ibid.).

Such applications are addressed to the sound judicial discretion of the court. This was emphasized by this Court in the very case relied on by petitioner, viz, National Labor Relations Board v. Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 318 U. S. 9 (at 16); see also Southport Petroleum Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 315 U. S. 100, 104. Both these decisions so held with respect to the practically identical provision of the National Labor Relations Act. That the Court of Appeals did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion in this case is evident, we submit, from the facts as above outlined (supra, pp. 277–282). The Board had unanimously found, "[u]pon the overwhelming weight of the evidence in this proceeding," that petitioner "is substantially directed, dominated, and controlled by the Soviet Union, which controls the world Communist movement" and "operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement" (R. 132 [2042])—a finding which brought petitioner within the definition of a "Communist-action organization" under § 3 (3) of the Act.

The only question before the Court of Appeals on the motion for leave to adduce additional evidence—even phrasing the issue in the language adopted by petitioner (see Br. 214)—was whether there was any reasonable possibility that the Board might come to a different conclusion if the case were remanded and further evidence taken.[92] That there was no such possibility was [92] The motion may be analogized to a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. Where the newly discovered evidence consists of evidence that a prosecution witness gave false testimony at the trial, a new trial should be granted only if the court is satisfied that the testimony was material and false and that "without it the jury might have reached a different conclusion." Larrison v. United States, 24 F. 2d 82, 87 (C. A. 7); United States v. Johnson, 142 F. 2d 588, 591 (C. A. 7), petition for certiorari dismissed, 323 U. S. 806; United States v. Johnson, 149 F. 2d 31, 44 (C. A. 7), reversed on other grounds, 327 U. S. 106; Gordon v. United States, 178 F. 2d 896, 900 (C. A. 6), certiorari denied, 339 U. S. 935; United States v. Flynn, 130 F. Supp. 412, 422 (S. D. N. Y.).

In the ordinary case—i. e., where the newly discovered evidence consists of something other than alleged perjury—a stricter test is employed. In such cases, the decisions hold, the court should not order a new trial unless it is convinced that consideration of the new evidence by the jury at a new trial would probably result in a different verdict. Brandon v. United States, 190 F. 2d 175, 178 (C. A. 9); Thompson v. United States, 188 F. 2d 652 (C. A. D. C.); Heald v. United States, 175 F. 2d 878, 883 (C. A. 10), certiorari denied, 338 U. S. 859; Weiss v. United States, 122 F. 2d 675, 691 (C. A. 5), certiorari denied, 314 U. S. 687; Johnson v. United States, 32 F. 2d 127, 130 (C. A. 8); United States v. Hiss, 107 F. Supp. 128, 136 (S. D. N. Y.), affirmed, 201 F. 2d 372 (C. A. 2), certiorari denied, 345 U. S. 942; see United States v. John- convincingly demonstrated by the Board's opposing memorandum, summarized above (pp. 279–282). Consequently, it was a proper exercise of judicial discretion for the court below to decline to remand the case for further proceedings which it knew could not affect the final result.

THE BOARD WAS AT ALL TIMES PROPERLY CONSTITUTED SINCE THE ORIGINAL RECESS APPOINTMENTS OF ITS MEMBERS WERE VALID UNDER THE CONSTITUTION AND CONFIRMATION OCCURRED BEFORE THE EXPIRATION OF THE NEXT SESSION OF CONGRESS

Petitioner contends that the order of the Board requiring it to register is invalid on certain technical grounds relating to the constitutional recess-appointment power of the President (Br. 185–191). It is contended that three of the four members who signed the order had not been validly appointed to the Board during a portion son, 327 U. S. 106, 110, fn. 4. This is also the uniform rule in the states. See Brief for the United States in Griffin v. United States, No. 417, Oct. Term, 1948, p. 20, fn. 6, where the state cases are collected. In the Griffin case, the Government suggested that where the offense in question is of a serious type, and particularly in a capital case (like Griffin), the "probability" rule might place too heavy a burden on the defendant and that the proper rule should be that of "reasonable possibility" (Br. 21)—a suggestion which this Court apparently accepted (see Griffin v. United States, 336 U. S. 704, 709), as did the dissenting opinion explicitly (at 724).

of the time in which they sat on the case, though it is conceded that even these three, having eventually been duly confirmed, were lawful members during most of the hearings as well as when the order under review was issued (Br. 185, 189–190). We submit that none of the various arguments advanced has merit and, further, that even if one or more were sound it would make no difference in the circumstances of this case.

Petitioner's challenge relates to the recess appointments of Board members Peter Campbell Brown, Kathryn McHale, and David J. Coddaire.[93] These three individuals, who were among the Board's original members, commenced their service on the Board as recess appointees under appointments dated October 23, 1950. Thereafter, the President in due course submitted their nominations to the Senate for confirmation, and they were confirmed on August 9, 1951. Petitioner concedes that all three of these appointments were in all respects valid and proper from and after the latter date (Br. 185, 189), which was more than 20 months prior to the entry of the order under review (April 20, 1953).

Petitioner's challenge relates to the 9-month period between the original recess appointments and Senate confirmation. It is argued, first, that the recess appointments were invalid ab initio (Br. 186–188), and, alternatively, that, assuming their original validity, they expired on January 2, 1951, with the expiration of the Second Session of the 81st Congress (Br. 188–189). Under the former view the appointees served illegally during the whole 9-month period between their appointment and Senate confirmation. Under the latter view there was a hiatus in their membership from January 2, 1951, until their confirmation on August 9, 1951. Under either view, it is urged, they were "usurpers" (Br. 189, 190, 191) at least between the two latter dates, during which period proceedings were conducted by the Board, including the beginning of the taking of testimony before a panel which included two of the members in question.

The court below found it unnecessary to pass upon the merits of these contentions (Op. 47–48, R. 2124–2125) since it determined that, regardless of the validity of the appointments of the panel-members when the hearings were commenced, the membership of the Board at the time it finally made its findings and conclusions and issued its order was unquestionably properly appointed and confirmed. Whether or not the panel was originally properly made up would not affect the validity of the final order, the court believed, since the evidence could have been taken by a hearing examiner (§ 13 (c) of the Act.[94] This disposition of the issue would make it unnecessary to untangle the several complicated arguments propounded by the petitioner with respect to recess appointments. However, since this Court might prefer to dispose of this issue on the merits, we proceed to a detailed analysis of the issues and to show that the recess appointments were valid when made and did not expire prior to the final Senate confirmation.

The pertinent facts are as follows:

On September 23, 1950, the Second Session of the 81st Congress enacted the Internal Security Act by passing it over a Presidential veto (see 64 Stat. 1031) and adjourned on the same day pursuant to a concurrent resolution of both Houses to a day certain, namely, November 27, 1950 (96 Cong. Rec. 15726). On October 23, 1950, the President, by recess appointments, appointed five members to the Board, including Brown, McHale,

[94] At most, petitioner only challenges the de jure status of the Board members prior to their confirmation. It is not disputed that they had at least de facto status throughout that period; that, in other words, they held valid offices under color of right thereto. Cf. Hussey v. Smith, 99 U. S. 20, 24; Ball v. United States, 140 U. S. 118, 128–129; McDowell v. United States, 159 U. S. 596, 601–602; Starr v. United States, 164 U. S. 627, 631; Ex parte Henry Ward, 173 U. S. 452, 454–456; United States ex rel. Doss v. Lindsley, 148 F. 2d 22 (C. A. 7), certiorari denied, 325 U. S. 858; Cardoza v. Baird, 30 App. D. and Coddaire. On November 27, 1950, the Second Session of the 81st Congress reconvened pursuant to the resolution of adjournment, and the President transmitted to the Senate his nominations of the Board members (96 Cong. Rec. 15785). On January 2, 1951, the Second Session of the 81st Congress adjourned sine die (96 Cong. Rec. 17121, 17138) without the Senate having acted on the nominations. On the following day, January 3, 1951, the First Session of the 82d Congress convened, and on February 12, 1951, the President resubmitted the nominations to the Senate for confirmation (97 Cong. Rec. 1228). On August 9, 1951, the nominations were confirmed (97 Cong. Rec. 9702). Throughout the foregoing period, proceedings relating to petitioner were being conducted before the Board, including the filing of the Attorney General's petition on November 22, 1950, the filing of petitioner's original and amended answers on February 14, and April 3, 1951, respectively, and the beginning of the hearings on April 23, 1951. The hearing panel was composed originally of Board members Brown, McHale, and one other, and eventually of Brown and McHale alone.[95] (Supra, p. 7.)

[95] As we have pointed out, the panel was reduced to two (Brown and McHale) when the third member, Mr. La Follette, failed to be confirmed by the Senate during the First Session of the 82d Congress. (Supra, pp. 7, 262–263.)

A. THE RECESS APPOINTMENTS WERE VALID WHEN MADE

The "recess appointment" clause of the Constitution (Art. II, § 2, cl. 3), pursuant to which the Board members in question were originally appointed on October 23, 1950, provides:

> The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

Petitioner's contention that the recess appointments in question were invalid from the beginning is based on three alternative arguments. First, it is claimed, no "vacancies" had "happened" on the Board within the meaning of the provision (Br. 186). Secondly, the vacancies, if they "happened" at all, did not happen during a "Recess of the Senate" (Br. 186–187). Thirdly, the vacancies were not "filled up"—i. e., the appointments were not made—during a "Recess of the Senate" (Br. 187–188).

Preliminarily, it should be noted that neither the debates at the Constitutional Convention nor any of the contemporaneous materials shed any additional light on the terse language of the pertinent clause of the Constitution in any respect here relevant.

1. "Vacancies" on the Board "happened" within the meaning of the recess appointment clause when the Board came into being upon the enactment of the Act

When the recess appointments here challenged were made, the Subversive Activities Control Board had just been created by law, so that the positions to which the appointees were named had had no prior occupants. Petitioner argues that the power of the President to make recess appointments is limited by the language of the constitutional provision to the filling of vacancies resulting from the "death, resignation, promotion or removal" of prior occupants of the offices to be filled, and does not extend to the filling of newly-created offices (Br. 186). No vacancy "happens" in the constitutional sense, it argues, when an office is newly created by law.[96]

[96] The array of authorities presented by petitioner to support its position (Br. 186–187) fades on analysis. The two senatorial expressions relied upon by Story appear to be more concerned with the power of the President to create a new office during a Senate recess than with the power to fill offices created by Congress. The district court opinion, Schenck v. Peay, 21 Fed. Cas. 672 (E. D. Ark.), and the various constitutional authorities, seem to confuse this issue with that dealt with under the next heading, whether the vacancy must first occur during a recess. The opinion in the Schenck case relies primarily on Judge Cadwalader's opinion in Case of District Attorney of United States, 7 Fed. Cas. 731 (E. D. Pa.), which is the main support for petitioner's argument on the next point, but has no relevance to this issue. The two very early opinions of Attorneys General, the first of which is pure dictum, are discredited by the later opinions cited below (pp. 292–293).

It is obvious, however, that petitioner's construction would frustrate to an important degree the very purpose of the Constitutional provision, which is to enable the business of government to be carried on by temporary appointments during periods when the Senate is not available to act on nominations to office. Nor is it required by the common or dictionary meaning of the word "vacancy." "Vacancy," as used with respect to an office, means the state of the office "when vacated or vacant;" "vacant," in turn, means "[n]ot filled or occupied by an incumbent, possessor, or officer" (Webster's New International Dictionary (2d ed.)). Hence an office which, being newly created, has never had an incumbent is "vacant" until filled. People v. Hylan, 212 N. Y. 236 (1914); Richardson v. Young, 122 Tenn. 471, 551 (1909); Condon v. Maloney, 108 Tenn. 82, 101 (1901); Walsh v. Commonwealth, 89 Penn. St. 419 (1879); 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 455 (1868); 18 Op. Atty. Gen. 28 (1884); 19 Op. Atty. Gen. 261 (1889); Morganston, The Appointing and Removal Power of the President of the United States, S. Doc. No. 172, 70th Cong., 2d sess., p. 116.

The reasons which prompted the framers of the Constitution, out of a wise foresight, to confer on the President the power to fill vacancies in the Senate's absence by granting temporary commissions are as pertinent in the case of offices which lack incumbents because newly created as in the case of those which lack incumbents because of the death, resignation, or removal of previous occupants. "I am unable to discriminate," wrote Attorney General Evarts in 1868, "between cases of continuing vacancy in the recess of the Senate, which originate during the session by the new creation of the office, and those which so originate by a lawful termination of an incumbency. Certainly the need of the official service in the public interest is presumptively as great in one case as the other, and the executive duty of the President, for the discharge of which this constitutional power is vested in him, is not qualified by the circumstance that the office is to be filled for the first time" (12 Op. Atty. Gen. 455, 457). Similarly, Attorney General Miller, in advising President Harrison in 1889 that he had the power to make a recess appointment to an office newly created by law, observed that "the word 'vacancy' in the Constitution * * * signifies the condition where an office exists, of which there is no incumbent. It is used without limitation as to how the vacancy comes to exist" (19 Op. Atty. Gen. 261, 263). To the same effect, see 18 Op. Atty. Gen. 28 (1884); 26 Op. Atty. Gen. 234 (1907); Morganston, op. cit. supra, p. 116.

2. The vacancies happened during a "Recess of the Senate" within the meaning of the recess appointment clause

Petitioner next argues that, since the vacancies on the Board arose simultaneously with the passage of the Act on September 23, 1950, while the Senate was still in session, they did not happen "during the Recess of the Senate;" hence, according to the argument, the President lacked power under the terms of Article II, § 2, clause 3 to fill the vacancies by recess appointments, even though, as we have pointed out (supra, p. 228), the Senate adjourned later that very day (Br. 186–187).

This prong of petitioner's argument is equally invalid. See 2 Watson, The Constitution of the United States (1910), pp. 988–990; 2 Tucker, The Constitution of the United States (1899), p. 741. The true meaning of the constitutional clause—the one which alone comports with its evident sense and spirit—is that the President may make recess appointments to fill vacancies which happen to exist during a Senatorial recess even though they may have come into existence while the Senate was in session. This construction has the support of Madison himself, who played so prominent a role in the drafting of the Constitution (4 Letters and Other Writings of James Madison (1865), p. 351). Madison's view was expressed in 1834. The same interpretation had been adopted even earlier, in 1823, by Attorney General Wirt, apparently without Madison's knowledge. In a cogently-reasoned opinion rendered for President Monroe, Wirt wrote (1 Op. Atty. Gen. 631, 633):

> Now, if we interpret the word "happen" as being merely equivalent to "happen to exist," (as I think we may legitimately do,) then all vacancies which, from any casualty, happen to exist at a time when the Senate cannot be consulted as to filling them, may be temporarily filled by the President; and the whole purpose of the constitution is completely accomplished.

* * * In reason, it seems to me perfectly immaterial when the vacancy first arose; for, whether it arose during the session of the Senate, or during their recess, it equally requires to be filled. The constitution does not look to the moment of the origin of the vacancy, but to the state of things at the point of time at which the President is called on to act. Is the Senate in session? Then he must make a nomination to that body. Is it in recess? Then the President must fill the vacancy by a temporary commission.

This seems to me the only construction of the constitution which is compatible with its spirit, reason, and purpose; while, at the same time, it offers no violence to its language. And these, I think, are the governing points to which all sound construction looks.

The same conclusion was reached in 1832, in another carefully reasoned opinion, by Attorney General (later Mr. Chief Justice) Taney (2 Op. Atty. Gen. 525), and the view has since been repeatedly reaffirmed over the years. 3 Op. Atty. Gen. 673 (1841); 4 Op. Atty. Gen. 523 (1846); 7 Op. Atty. Gen. 186, 223 (1855); 10 Op. Atty.

Gen. 356 (1862); 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 32 (1866); 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 449 (1868); 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 455 (1868); 14 Op. Atty. Gen. 562 (1875); 15 Op. Atty. Gen. 207 (1877); 16 Op. Atty. Gen. 522 (1880); 16 Op. Atty. Gen. 538 (1880); 18 Op. Atty. Gen. 29 (1884); 19 Op. Atty. Gen. 261 (1889); 26 Op. Atty. Gen. 234 (1907); 30 Op. Atty. Gen. 314 (1914); 33 Op. Atty. Gen. 20 (1921). Attorney General Daugherty, in the last-cited opinion, was able to describe Attorney General Wirt's opinion of 1823, supra, as having been followed "with practically unbroken unanimity" [97] (33 Op. Atty. Gen. at 22). The executive interpretation is thus a firmly settled one, practically spanning the nation's history. It rests, furthermore, as we have seen, on the most cogent of reasons.[98] Such an interpretation "on the part of the executive department, acquiesced in by the legislative department, while not absolutely binding on the judicial department, is entitled to great regard in determining the true construction of a constitutional provision the phraseology of which is in any respect of doubtful meaning." The Pocket Veto Case, 279 U. S. 655, 690.

[97] Only two opinions to the contrary, both very early, have been discovered: 2 Op. Atty. Gen. 333, 334 (1830); 4 Op. Atty. Gen. 361, 363 (1845). Neither makes reference to the earlier opinion of Attorney General Wirt, nor does either analyze the issue or advance reasons for the conclusion reached. The 1845 opinion was limited to cases of vacancies which are "known to exist during the session of the Senate" and which nevertheless are not filled in the ordinary manner, i. e., nomination by the President and confirmation by the Senate (4 Op. Atty. Gen. at 363). It is evident that the rationale of the latter opinion would not apply to the case at bar, where the Senate adjourned on the very day on which the vacancies arose. Moreover, Attorney General Mason, who rendered the 1845 opinion, in effect reversed himself in a more elaborate opinion written in the following year (4 Op. Atty. Gen. 523, supra), in which he expressed "general concurrence with his three predecessors [i. e., Wirt, Taney, and Mr. Legare, the author of 3 Op. Atty. Gen. 673, supra]" (12 Op. Atty. Gen. 32, supra, at 33).

This firmly settled executive interpretation has also received judicial support. In re Farrow, 3 Fed. 112 (C. C., N. D. Ga., 1880).[99] In that case Circuit Judge (later Mr. Justice) Woods pointed out that ten different Attorneys General, commencing with Attorney General Wirt in 1823 (supra, pp. 294–295) and continuing down to the then Attorney General Devens in 1880, had all agreed that the recess appointment power extends to the filling of vacancies which, while first occurring during a session of the Senate, continue to exist during the Senate's recess. He then considered the opposing view of District Judge Cadwalader, expressed in Case of District Attorney of United States, 7 Fed. Cas. 731 (E. D.

[98] As observed, moreover, by Attorney General Stanbery in 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 32, supra, if a "verbal construction" of the recess appointment clause were sound, a vacancy which occurred during a recess might "be filled by the President without the consent of the Senate whilst the Senate is in session; but no one maintains that position" (at 39).

[99] Cf. In re Yancey, 28 Fed. 445 (C. C., W. D. Tenn., 1886).

Pa., 1868), on which petitioner relies (Br. 187, fn. 110). Circuit Judge Woods pointed out that this was the sole authority to the contrary [100] and stated that it "ought not to be held to outweigh the authority of the great number which are cited in support of the opposite view," the practice of the executive department for nearly 60 years, "and the acquiescence of the senate therein" (3 Fed. at 115).

The reasonableness of this long-established executive practice and interpretation is peculiarly exemplified in this case, where the Senate adjourned later on the same day in which the vacancies arose. Obviously, it would have been a practical impossibility for the President to make nominations to fill the new offices and for the Senate to confirm the nominees prior to the hour set for adjournment.

3. The appointments were made during a "Recess of the Senate" within the meaning of the recess appointment clause

In the preceding point petitioner argued that the recess appointments in issue were invalid because the vacancies did not occur during a Senatorial recess. In this point the argument is that the appointments were invalid because the vacancies were not filled during such a recess. The "Recess" referred to in the recess appointment clause, contends petitioner (Br. 187–188), refers exclusively to "the sine die recess between the annual sessions of Congress or between an annual and an extraordinary session" (Br. 188). That is to say, the term does not include "the interval between an adjournment of the Congress to a day certain and its next sitting date" (ibid.). This facet of petitioner's argument is also erroneous. Intrasessional adjournments to a day certain, if of substantial duration, as well as sine die adjournments between sessions, are recesses within the meaning of the constitutional clause. Gould v. United States, 19 Ct. Cl. 593, 595–596 (1884); Case of District Attorney of United States, 7 Fed. Cas. 731, 744 (E. D. Pa., 1868); 33 Op. Atty. Gen. 20 (1921).

[100] Indeed, as indicated in Judge Cadwalader's opinion, the only thing he appears actually to have decided was that, notwithstanding the numerous opinions by Attorneys General to the effect that the President has the power to make recess appointments under the circumstances in question, "the question, whenever directly litigated, will be quite open for judicial contestation" (7 Fed. Cas. at 744).

It is true that there is language in Attorney General Knox's opinion in 23 Op. Atty. Gen. 599 (1901)—the sole authority cited by petitioner in support of its position (Br. 188)—to the effect that "the Recess" as used in the recess appointment clause refers only to sine die adjournments between sessions and does not extend to adjournments to a day certain within a session (23 Op. Atty. Gen. at 601). The only issue involved in that opinion, however, related to whether the President had the power to make a recess appointment during a short holiday adjournment of the Senate,[101] the opinion concluding that he did not. However, a subsequent opinion by Attorney General Daugherty, which reviewed all the authorities to date, while not disagreeing with Attorney General Knox's decision on its facts (i. e., that brief holiday or other very short adjournments are not recesses within the meaning of the constitutional clause), dissented from, and in effect overruled, the latter's broad generalization to the effect that no intrasessional adjournment to a day certain can constitute such a recess. 33 Op. Atty Gen. 20 (1921).

"It seems to me that the broad and underlying purpose of the Constitution," said this opinion, "is to prohibit the President from making appointments without the advice and consent of the Senate whenever that body is in session so that its advice and consent can be obtained. Regardless of whether the Senate has adjourned or recessed, the real question, as I view it, is whether in a practical sense the Senate is in session so that its advice and consent can be obtained. To give the word 'recess' a technical and not a practical construction, is to disregard substance for form" (33 Op. Atty. Gen. at 21–22). After reviewing the long line of rulings of the Attorney General, to which we have already referred (supra, pp. 294–296), holding that the recess appointment power extends to vacancies happening while the Senate is in session and still remaining unfilled at the close of the session (at 22–23), and after pointing out that the sound reason for this construction is the continuing necessity that vacancies be filled to the end that the laws may be enforced, the opinion observed that the same reasoning compelled the conclusion that the power in question extends to periods of substantial duration in which the Senate, having in fact adjourned to a fixed date, is not (though the "session" technically continues) "sitting" in any practical sense of the term so as to be able to receive and act on nominations to office (at 23). The opinion concluded that (at 25):

> [T]he essential inquiry, it seems to me, is this: Is the adjournment of such duration that the members of the Senate owe no duty of attendance? Is its chamber empty? Is the Senate absent so that it can not receive communications from the President or participate as a body in making appointments?
> In this connection I think the President is necessarily vested with a large, although not unlimited, discretion to determine when there is a real and genuine recess making it impossible for him to receive the advice and consent of the Senate. Every presumption is to be indulged in favor > of the validity of whatever action he may take. * * *

The Attorney General, in thus giving the recess appointment clause a soundly practical construction, was on eminently good ground. See Wright v. United States, 302 U. S. 583, 589–590, 592, 597, where this Court emphasized the necessity of giving a practical construction to the analogous "pocket veto" clause of the Constitution.[102] Even District Judge Cadwalader—whose opinion in Case of District Attorney of United States, 7 Fed. Cas. 731 (E. D. Pa., 1868), is so strongly relied upon by petitioner with respect to the companion question of whether a vacancy occurring in a session but continuing into a recess may be filled by a recess appointment (see supra, pp. 297–298)—fails to support petitioner on the present point. "On every adjournment of congress," he said, "except such an occasional temporary one as does not suspend the course of business of the two houses, the interval until the next meeting should, I think, be deemed a recess" (at 744).[103]

[102] It is significant that the three-day adjournment of the Senate which was in issue in the Wright case is referred to throughout the Court's opinion as a "recess".

[103] Our position finds further support in the Report of the Senate Judiciary Committee presented March 2, 1905, in response to a Senate Resolution calling upon it to construe the recess appointment clause. This Report (S. Rep. No. 4389, 58th Cong., 3d sess., reproduced in full at 39 Cong. Rec. 3823–

Reason and authority thus unite with the natural usage of the language in compelling the conclusion that an intrasessional adjournment to a day certain, if of substantial duration, constitutes "the Recess" within the meaning of the recess appointment clause.

B. THE RECESS APPOINTMENTS DID NOT EXPIRE ON JANUARY 2, 1951, WITH THE EXPIRATION OF THE SECOND SESSION OF THE 81ST CONGRESS

Each of the points discussed thus far (supra, pp. 290–303) has related to the initial validity of the recess appointments in issue. Petitioner, in its final contention (Br. 188–189), assumes arguendo the appointments' initial validity, and argues that they expired by operation of law on January 2, 1951, thus leaving a seven-month period—from January 3 to August 9, 1951, when the nominations were confirmed—during which, allegedly, the challenged members did not sit as of right. "[I]f," according to the argument, "the adjournment of Congress from September 23 to November 27, 3824 and in 5 Hind's Precedents of the House of Representatives, § 6687), while not addressed to the precise issue here involved, emphasizes that the word "recess" should be given its "ordinary" or "common and popular" sense. See also The Pocket Veto Case, 279 U. S. 655, 680; cf. Cannon's Procedure in the House of Representatives (1953 ed.), House Doc. No. 562, 82d Cong., 2d sess., p. 4, where an adjournment for more than three days (which, under Article I, § 5, clause 4 of the Constitution, neither House may take without the consent of the other) is described as a "recess."

1950 was 'the Recess,' then November 27 must have been the beginning of its 'next Session,' " with the consequence, it is argued, that "the appointments expired on January 2, 1951 when the 'next session' ended with the sine die adjournment of Congress" (Br. 188).

This branch of petitioner's argument is also invalid. The sitting from November 27, 1950, to January 2, 1951, was a continuation or resumption of the same session—the Second Session of the 81st Congress—which had been interrupted by the two-month recess commencing September 23, 1950. Gilfry, Senate Precedents, 1789–1913, p. 30; 5 Hind's Precedents of the House of Representatives, §§ 6676–6686. The "next Session" was the First Session of the 82d Congress. That session began on January 3, 1951 (97 Cong. Rec. 3, 5) and did not end until October 20, 1951 (97 id. 13732, 13783). During it, on August 9, 1951, as we have seen, the Senate duly confirmed the regularly submitted nominations of the members whose tenure petitioner challenges (97 id. 9702). Since, according to the terms of the constitutional clause, recess appointments do not expire until "the End" of the "next Session," the recess appointments here in issue remained in full force at all times up to the point in this "next Session" when confirmation occurred, at which point the appointees commenced to serve under their regular or permanent appointments, thus leaving no gap in their tenure. Gould v. United States, supra, 19 Ct. Cl. 593, 595–596; 23 Op. Atty. Gen. 599, 604 (1901); cf. 20 Op. Atty. Gen. 503 (1892).

There can be no doubt that the framers of the Constitution contemplated that a session of Congress could be interrupted by Congress' adjourning or recessing to a fixed date, and that on that day the same session would resume. This is clear from Article I, § 5, clause 4, which provides that "Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting" [emphasis added]. It is a common occurrence for Congress, with the concurrence of both Houses, to adjourn for substantial periods of time "during the Session," with provision for reconvening after the recess. See 5 Hind's Precedents of the House of Representatives, §§ 6676–6686. This is precisely what the Second Session of the 81st Congress did in this case. For petitioner's argument to have merit, the reconvening of that Session on November 27, 1950, would have to be treated as if it were a special or extraordinary session of Congress, which under the Constitution (Article II, § 3) the President alone has the power to convene.

Petitioner's instant contention is refuted by the very opinion of the Attorney General on which it relied for its previous argument (see supra, pp. 298–303) that an intrasessional adjournment is not a "recess" under the recess appointment clause, viz., Attorney General Knox's opinion in 23 Op. Atty. Gen. 599 (1901). "If an adjournment during a session is a recess within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution in question," Attorney General Knox pointed out, "then the commission of an appointee of the President would extend in this case to the end of the Fifty-seventh Congress, as the Constitution provides that it shall extend to the end of the next session, not the session witnin which the recess occurs. The only theory to defeat such a conclusion would be that the reassembling of the Senate after each adjournment constitutes a new session, a position wholly untenable in view of the constitutional provision as to adjournments during the session" (at 604).

The sole authority which petitioner is able to cite in support of its present contention (Br. 188–189) is a dictum by District Judge Cadwalader in Case of District Attorney of United States, 7 Fed. Cas. 731, 744 (E. D. Pa., 1868). Judge Cadwalader stated that he was "incline[d] to think" that the recess appointment in question, if it had been valid initially (but he thought it had not, though his view on that point too was dictum, see fn. 100, supra, p. 298), would have expired when the Senate, having adjourned to a day certain within the session, reconvened and again adjourned on the same day to a still later date within the session, if, further, the original resolution of adjournment had been worded differently from the way in which it was in fact worded. The tenuousness of this case as an authority needs no elaboration. We submit, moreover, that it cannot stand analysis in the light of the unambiguous terms of the Constitution. The Constitution, as we have pointed out (supra, p. 305), and as recognized by Attorney General Knox (supra, p. 306) and the Court of Claims in the Gould case (supra, pp. 304–305), clearly contemplates the possibility that a Session of Congress may recess temporarily from time to time to a specified date and reconvene on the date agreed upon, without thereby fragmentizing the Session into a number of particular "sessions."

Summary of Argument ..... 2

ARGUMENT ..... 8

POINT I—The registration provisions of the Internal Security Act, on their face and as applied in this case, violate the constitutional right to freedom of expression as embodied in the First Amendment 8

A. The Operation of the Registration Provisions 8

1. In their actual working the registration provisions operate to destroy or at least hopelessly cripple, any organization required to register ..... 8

2. The registration provisions are designed and operate to eliminate the normal and legitimate activities carried on by organizations compelled to register ..... 17

3. The impact of the registration provisions carries far beyond the Communist Party and its immediate environs; it seriously restricts freedom of expression throughout the whole liberal movement and indeed the entire population ..... 23

B. It is not within the power of government under the first amendment to prohibit a political association from engaging in the normal and legitimate forms of political activity. This is true even though such association engages in other activities that are illegitimate, or even though such association is controlled by an organization that engages in illegitimate activity ..... 27

1. On its face the Act compels registration regardless of whether the organization has engaged in any illegitimate activity whatsoever, or is controlled by an organization that does. Such a requirement plainly violates the First Amendment ..... 28

2. Even if we assume that an organization required to register must be shown to have engaged in illegitimate activity or to be controlled by another that does, it is still clear that the government cannot prevent that organization from engaging in legitimate activity ..... 29

3. The justifications for the registration provisions advanced in the Internal Security Act and by the government in argument here are wholly inadequate as reasons for not following the foregoing principles in this case ..... 37

(a) Advancing the Objectives of the World Communist Movement ..... 38

(b) Foreign Control ..... 39

C. The registration provisions are invalid under the First Amendment because they are not narrowly drawn to meet the problem Congress ostensibly undertook to solve ..... 42

D. Conclusion on the First Amendment ..... 44

POINT II—The Act is invalid as violative of the privilege against self-incrimination ..... 45

BRIEF OF NATIONAL LAWYERS GUILD AS AMICUS CURIAE

The Interest of the National Lawyers Guild

The National Lawyers Guild is a national bar association formed in 1937, as it then stated,

> "to bring together all lawyers who regard adjustments to new conditions as more important than the veneration of precedent, who recognize the importance of safeguarding and extending the rights of workers and farmers upon whom the welfare of the entire nation depends, of maintaining our civil rights and liberties and our democratic institutions, and who look upon the law as a living and flexible instrument which must be adapted to the needs of the people."

Since its formation the National Lawyers Guild has consistently sought to arouse the talents and energies of the legal profession in the solution of the urgent problems facing American democracy. In this task it has attempted to make a contribution on numerous controversial issues of domestic and foreign policy; and it has on many occasions undertaken the defense of unpopular causes where it conceived important legal principles to be at stake. Occupying as it has a position somewhat to the left of center, it has experienced at first hand some of the official and unofficial pressures that have sought, particularly in the last few years, to curb the activities of liberal groups in this country.

The National Lawyers Guild therefore appreciates the opportunity, made possible by the consent of the Solicitor General and counsel for petitioner, to present its views on the far-reaching issues involved in this case. It does so from the standpoint, not of the Communist Party which is ably represented here, but of liberal lawyers deeply concerned with the impact of the legislation under review upon the civil liberties of the whole nation. It will attempt to present to the Court certain considerations from the vantage point of attorneys who have participated in the defense of those civil liberties and who have seen modern repressions at work.

Our views will be restricted to two of the most significant constitutional issues: (1) the validity of the registration provisions of the Internal Security Act under the First Amendment, and (2) the validity of those provisions under the self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Summary of Argument

I(A)

The registration provisions of the Internal Security Act operate to destroy organizations required to register thereunder by branding the organization and its members as part of a movement dedicated to "treachery, * * * espionage, sabotage, terrorism". Because the stigma is affixed through official proceedings, wherein limited review by the courts creates the impression of judicial sanction, the effect of the branding is intensified. The stigma attaches not only to the organization, but also to individual members, both of "Communist-action" and "Communist-front" organizations, since the names and addresses of all Communist-action members and of all "Communist-front" donors of funds (which includes dues-paying members) must be disclosed for public record.

In addition to the stigma, members of registered organizations become, in effect, public nominees for criminal prosecution under the Smith Act, under Section 4a of the Internal Security Act and under other laws. Members of registered organizations also suffer numerous other financial deprivations such as blacklist from various types of employment, denial of passports, etc., and are subjected to a great many non-governmental sanctions and pressures.

It is unlikely that any registered organization could survive and retain its members much less secure new members in the light of these sanctions.

Penalties for failure to register and for false registration are a serious source of danger to leaders and members of the organization. Every action of a registered organization involving a financial transaction is to be revealed under the law and made available to a hostile press and public; and every person who actively participates in a "Communist-action" organization finds his conduct recorded for inspection by every government authority with subpoena power. What appears thus to be a simple disclosure regulation, similar to lobbying and newspaper registration requirements, becomes in context—particularly in the light of the criteria of membership set forth in Section 5 of the Communist Control Act—a tangle of legal traps.

The object of this Act is to prevent and to punish conduct not subject to existing law—those activities in support of the world Communist movement which are carried on through traditional and legitimate methods of peaceful political action.

The impact of the registration provisions not only suppresses rights of free speech and association of organizations required to register but reaches beyond those organizations to encompass and restrict the First Amendment freedoms of the whole liberal movement. For the standards of what constitutes a "Communist-front" organization are so broad that any organization whose policies do not differ sharply from those of the Communist Party on any public issue has reason to fear possible application of the Act. And the standards of membership are so vague that few individuals will risk joining voluntary associations which engage in any sort of political activity.

I(B)

The issue presented to the Court is whether the Government has power, in spite of the First Amendment, to adopt measures which prevent a political association from engaging in the usual types of political activity because the organization is or may be tainted with other illegitimate activity or is controlled by a tainted organization.

The requirement to register is made without proof of illegitimate activity and the disabilities resultant from registration are imposed on all activities—legitimate or otherwise—of the organization. In thus preventing peaceful political association, the Act clearly violates the First Amendment under the doctrine of DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353 and Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242.

The principle of the DeJonge case does not rest upon any application of the clear and present danger test. Neither there nor in the Herndon case did the Court rely on or even mention that test. The reason is that any consequences arising from the legitimate activity repressed here, as in the DeJonge case—the holding of peaceful meetings, the support of candidates in elections, the issuance of leaflets and books containing normal political discussion—cannot be "an evil that Congress has a right to prevent." If such normal political conduct could be considered as giving rise to an "evil" then there would be no meaning left to the First Amendment. Consequently the findings of Congress, the Board and the lower Court with respect to clear and present danger are wholly irrelevant to the issue now before the Court. A fortiori any test of "reasonableness" is inapplicable under the DeJonge rule.

Apparently the two main reasons behind the suppression of the legitimate activities of "Communist-action" and "Communist-front" organizations, are that these organizations are said to operate to "advance the objectives" of the world Communist movement and that they are "dominated or controlled" by a foreign government. To the extent that advancing the objectives of the world Communist movement is pursued through peaceful and democratic means, such action is protected by the First Amendment. The Government can properly concern itself only with the methods and not with the goals of political action.

The kind of foreign control envisaged by the Act and found by the Board in this case cannot operate to change the DeJonge rule. The character of the "foreign control" which stamps an organization as a "Communist-action" group is illustrated by the standards embodied in Section 13(e) which authorizes the Board to rely on such matters as the extent to which activities of an organization "do not deviate from those of such foreign government" and allows the Board to make and offer as relevant such findings as it did here that "a substantial number of respondent's present leaders * * * have been to the Soviet Union on numerous occasions * * * and have been * * * trained in the Soviet Union on Russian strategy and policies" (Bd. Rep't., p. 20).

To say that by reason of "foreign control" of such a character a domestic organization can be restrained by the Government from pursuing legitimate political activity, would strike at the heart of the First Amendment and deny its freedoms to any organization with international affiliations, such as the Roman Catholic Church and Zionist organizations.

I(C)

The registration provisions are invalid under the First Amendment for an additional reason—that they are not drawn narrowly enough to meet the specific abuses Congress sought to correct. Legislation impinging on First Amendment rights must meet the specific abuse and may not "sweep within its orbit" a mass of other matters with which Congress has no power to concern itself. Schneider v. State, 308 U. S. 147, and others.

I(D)

The legislation now before the Court infringes upon freedom of expression to a degree never before approached by an Act of Congress. The Court must decide whether sweeping restrictions operating to harass free expression of the liberal movement will be sustained because they are ostensibly directed at the Communist movement. The issues and the times call for firm adherence to the fundamental purpose the First Amendment was designed to serve.

II

The Act violates the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination by requiring individual members of a "Communist-action" organization to profess membership in an organization which, by legislation ranging from the Smith Act to the Internal Security Act to the statute outlawing the Communist Party, has again and again been branded a criminal conspiracy by the Congress.

It is clear that upon a proper claim of privilege disclosure of membership in the Communist Party cannot be compelled. Quinn v. U. S., 349 U. S. 155, and others. That the Act bars the use of such disclosure as evidence in subsequent criminal proceedings does not relieve the unconstitutionality of the registration requirements because the immunity thus offered falls short of the reach of the privilege. U. S. v. Bryan, 339 U. S. 323, Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 457.

The question is at issue now and is not prematurely raised, for unless the constitutional infringement is here asserted, the occasion for asserting it may never arise. While the privilege is personal, so is freedom of association and expression, and the Court recognized the standing of a voluntary association to assert those personal rights of its membership. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123. The issue is timely, for when should the privilege be asserted by the individual who claims it? If the organization fails to register, the individual has 60 days in which to register himself. If within that time he fails to do so, or to file a claim of privilege, he may be deemed to have waived the privilege. If within that time he files a claim of privilege, he will have, in effect, directed attention to his possible membership and supplied at least a lead to possible criminal involvement and exposure to countless legal, social and economic sanctions. Where legislation, on its face, involves clear violation of a constitutional guarantee, the earliest reasonable appropriate occasion for reviewing that legislation is the timely occasion to do so.

POINT I

The registration provisions of the Internal Security Act, on their face and as applied in this case, violate the constitutional right to freedom of expression as embodied in the First Amendment.

A. The Operation of the Registration Provisions

In considering the validity of the registration provisions under the First Amendment it is first necessary to analyze in some detail the actual operation of those provisions, not only as they affect the Communist Party but as they have an impact upon freedom of political expression generally. We will not undertake to summarize the pertinent provisions of the Act—they are fully set forth in petitioner's brief—but will proceed at once to discuss three fundamental aspects of their functioning: (1) the effect upon organizations required to register; (2) the extent to which they curtail the legitimate activities of organizations required to register; and (3) their impact upon the liberal movement generally and upon freedom of expression throughout the whole country.

It should be made clear that we are not, for the moment, concerned with the alleged justification for the registration provisions. Those issues are discussed hereafter. Our present purpose is to show how the structure and operation of the Act works in terms of present political realities.

1. In their actual working the registration provisions operate to destroy or at least hopelessly cripple, any organization required to register.

The first and overwhelming fact is that any organization forced to register under the Internal Security Act is officially branded as a disloyal, traitorous and alien group, its members marked as political and social outcasts. By the terms of the Act such an organization and each member is stigmatized as part of a movement dedicated to "treachery, deceit, infiltration * * *, espionage, sabotage, terrorism" (§ 2(1)); which exercises its "control over the people through fear, terrorism, and brutality" (§ 2(2)); whose objective is to set up a totalitarian dictatorship which will be "subservient" to a foreign power (§ 2(6)); and whose followers "repudiate their allegiance to the United States, and in effect transfer their allegiance" to a foreign country (§ 2(9)). This is not simple registration as a lobbyist, or as a spender of campaign funds, or as the owner of a newspaper, or even as a taker of bets. It is registration under a brand that evokes the most bitter emotional response and results in the severest popular sanctions.

Moreover, the branding is accomplished through official proceedings that add greatly to its impact. Formal charges are filed by the Department of Justice; a highly publicized hearing is held, at which dramatic testimony of informers and undercover F. B. I. agents is produced; formal findings are issued by a governmental agency labelled "Subversive Activities Control Board"; the decision is reviewed by the courts in a proceeding which, though limited, creates an impression of judicial approval and adds the prestige of judicial sanction. Once the organization has registered all communication with the public must be stamped with the official brand, thus constantly recreating and reinforcing the original stigma in the public mind.

Furthermore, this process of branding as a public enemy is directed not only against organizations but against individuals. In the case of a "Communist-action" organization the Act requires a listing in the Department of Justice files, open to public inspection, of each member with his address (§§ 7(d), 9). In the case of "Communist-front" organizations the same result is accomplished through the requirement in the Attorney General's regulations that the source of all funds be given, including the names and addresses of all donors; this compels the listing of all dues payments and hence of all members.[1] Thus every individual member of an organization required to register finds his own name publicly recorded with the Department of Justice as a traitor to his country.

The Act is thus designed to place a badge of infamy upon specified organizations and individuals. Such official branding, by the powerful and authoritative state, has proved an overwhelming sanction in the past. It is perhaps even more effective in modern society. Present day systems of mass communication, pressures for conformity, and methods of opinion manipulation make the ancient punishment of public infamy one of the state's most destructive controls over political expression.[2]

It is scarcely likely that any organization which seeks the support of public opinion in the arena of political controversy could withstand such an attack today. This is particularly true of the alleged "Communist-front" organizations which do not have the degree of resistance to state attack that a more battered and hardened "Communist-action" organization might be expected to have. But even a "Communist-action" organization could hardly be expected to survive except as an underground group.

The registration provisions involve more than stamping with a badge of infamy. An integral part of the scheme imposes other consequences which make membership in a registered organization intolerable.

[2] For an account of the use of infamy as an official sanction against political and other dissent, see Mitchell Franklin, The Encyclopédiste Origin and Meaning of the Fifth Amendment, 15 Law. Guild Rev. 41 (1955). An early acount of the force of public opinion in the United States appears in De Tocqueville, Democracy in America (Bradley ed., 1945) vol. I, pp. 263-70.

In the first place, members of registered organizations become obvious and exposed candidates for criminal prosecution. Already the government has procured scores of indictments under the Smith Act for conspiracy and, except in isolated instances, obtained convictions. Recently the government has obtained indictments and convictions under the Smith Act for "knowing" membership in the Communist Party. Moreover any member of a registered organization would run a risk of prosecution under Section 4(a) of the Internal Security Act—a provision which makes it unlawful, subject to a prison sentence up to ten years—"to combine, conspire, or agree with any other person to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship." And the danger of prosecution is greatly enhanced by Section 5 of the Communist Control Act of 1954, which establishes startlingly broad standards for proof of membership or participation in the Communist Party (68 Stat. 775).

Members of registered organizations become, in effect, publicly nominated for criminal prosecution under these or other laws. Their names are prominently displayed, their guilt has already been officially announced; the pressures for invoking criminal action are aroused and focused upon them. At least so most members could reasonably believe and fear.

Thus continued membership in a registered organization becomes an immediate hazard. Only resignation, or perhaps recantation, offers hope of salvation. New membership is unthinkable.

Registration also brings with it a further series of official deprivations. No member of a registered organization may, because of that membership alone, hold any non-elective government position (§ 5(a)). No member of a "Communist-action" organization may hold any employment, whether related to classified material or not, in any defense facility (§ 5(a)); members of "Communist-front" organizations must disclose such membership in applying for a job in a defense plant (§ (a)) and, under present security systems, would almost certainly be denied employment.[3] No members of a registered organization may apply for or use a passport (§ 6); he is thus denied the right to travel beyond the borders of the United States. If recently naturalized, he may be subject to denaturalization (§ 25); if an alien he is excludable, deportable and ineligible for naturalization (§§ 22, 25).

Moreover, registration exposes an individual to countless other Federal, state and local laws, regulations, restrictions and harassments directed against "subversive activities." Any person holding membership in a registered organization automatically becomes an obvious target—an easy mark—for one or more Federal, state or local investigating committees. He would almost certainly be barred from teaching in public schools or state universities. If drafted, he would be subject to ignominious disabilities. If a tenant in a Federally assisted housing project, he would, so long as the Gwinn Amendment stands, be subject to eviction. He would run serious risks of being denied admission to, or ousted from, a profession. In some states he would be denied unemployment compensation. In Indiana he could not become a professional boxer. And so on.

It is quite true that a member of an organization might be subjected to these restrictions and harassments even if the Act did not provide for registration. But registration intensifies and magnifies the whole process. It focuses public attention on the individual and makes application of the restrictions automatic, inevitable and overwhelming.

Nor would the difficulties confronting a member of a registered organization end with official sanctions. He would be equally subject to restrictions and pressures of private individuals and groups. Many an employer would refuse him a job. No work in the movie, radio, television industries, or in many industrial plants, would be open to him. Few, if any, private schools or universities would tolerate him. Many organizations would deny him admission or expel him. His social life in the community, and that of his wife and children, would be strained and tense, or worse.

It is quite true, here also, that these restrictions and pressures exist apart from the registration provisions. But again the registration provisions, with their brand of a scarlet letter would train an official spot-light upon individuals which would enormously increase their vulnerability. Or at least—and the result is the same—most persons would reasonably feel so.

Another serious source of danger to leaders and members, and prospective leaders and members, of organizations required to register grows out of the penalties imposed for failure to register, false registration, and the like. On their face these provisions may seem nothing more than routine enforcement measures. But taken in context they constitute a tangle of legal traps, ready to be sprung by zealous prosecuting officials.

The leadership of an organization compelled to register, for example, finds itself in a precarious position. If the organization, by a mere majority vote, decides not to register then the president, vice-president, treasurer and every member of the governing board become subject to a swift and relatively simple prosecution, culminating in prison terms up to five years for each day the failure to register continues.[4] If the organization decides to register then the above officers must furnish within thirty days after final order, and annually thereafter, elaborate, detailed and exact information on every sum received and expended by the organization for the past year, all evidences of debt, and an account of all liabilities.[5] A "Communist-action" organization must furnish a complete list of all members during the preceding year with their addresses and aliases (§ 7(d)). Every organization must also "make and keep current all bookkeeping and other financial records relating to registrant's activities, including cancelled checks, bank statements, and records of income and disbursements, showing names and addresses of all persons who have paid moneys to the registrant or who have received moneys from the registrant, the specific amounts so paid or received, the date on which each item was paid or received and the purpose for which any item was expended."[6] A "Communist-action" organization must in addition "make and keep current such books and records as will disclose the names and addresses of the members of the registrant, the officers and employees of the registrant, and the names and addresses of persons, other than members, officers or employees, who actively participate in the activities of the registrant."[7]

The registration forms provided by the Department of Justice give prominent display to the Federal statute which provides up to five years' imprisonment for anyone who "knowingly and wilfully falsifies, conceals or covers up * * * a material fact, ~~or makes any~~ false, fictitious or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or entry." [8] Voluntary associations in the political field, possibly with the exception of the Communist Party, notoriously operate in a loose and amateurish fashion. The probability of discovering mistakes in the elaborate data required to be filed or kept is high. True, the statutes punish only "knowing" or "willful" errors. But these terms are broadly construed by the courts and in any event present an issue for the jury, very likely an unfriendly one. Nor can the leadership of a registered organization count upon forbearance or mercy from the Department of Justice.[9] As a result, the leadership finds itself extremely vulnerable to criminal prosecution with cumulative penalties. Faced with such possibilities it takes a most courageous or indifferent person to assume responsibility for the leadership of any organization which might at some time be faced with an order to register.

Similar dangers face persons who are or contemplate becoming members of organizations likely to be compelled to register. Every member of a "Communist-action" organization is liable to cumulative penalties if he fails to register individually after the organization itself refuses to register or does not register his name (§ 8). Since it is most unlikely the Communist Party would register, this provision subjects all its members to an immediate prosecution in which the only issue would be the question of membership. Such procedure enables the government to avoid the long trials which have characterized Smith Act prosecutions and to conduct prosecutions of alleged Communist Party members on a mass production basis. When one takes into account the hopelessly broad and vague standards of Section 5 of the Communist Control Act, detailing the type of evidence upon which a jury may find [9] Note, for example, the five unsuccessful proceedings against Harry Bridges, the abortive prosecution of Owen Lattimore, and the groundless indictment of Val Lorwin.

Communist Party membership, the risks to any member of a registered organization become apparent.

The registration provisions of the Internal Security Act impinge not only upon the leadership and members of organizations subject, or possibly subject, to the Act, but also upon all relations of the organization with the community in which it attempts to function. As already stated, a registered organization must file an itemized account of all funds received, including the date, the source from whom received, and the amount; a list of all payments, to whom each was made, the amount, and the purpose for which it was made; and a statement of all evidences of debt and all liabilities. This information must be kept up to date by annual reports. It is open to public inspection at the Department of Justice. In addition, books and records must be kept, including the names and addresses of all persons "who actively participate" in the activities of a "Communist-action" organization. These are available to the Department of Justice, legislative investigating committees, or any public authority with subpoena power.

The result is that every action of a registered organization involving a financial transaction—in effect most important actions it takes—is revealed to a hostile press and public. The name of every individual or group contributing financial support, or having any financial dealing, is mercilessly exposed to all the public and private pressures that generate around unpopular causes. In addition, every person who can be said to "actively participate" in the affairs of a "Communist-action" organization finds his conduct recorded for inspection by every governmental authority with subpoena power. These facts should be considered particularly in the light of the vague provisions of Section 4(a), subjecting to criminal prosecution any person who "substantially contributes" to the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship, and of Section 5 of the Communist Control Act, establishing criteria for proof of "membership" or "participation" in the Communist Party.

Under such circumstances, no matter what the leadership and members did, a registered organization would find itself effectively throttled. Financial support would be largely cut off. Meeting places would be hard to find. Speakers would be reluctant to appear. Even business dealings—such as obtaining the services of a printer—would be seriously curtailed. No political organization could function under such conditions. Inevitably it would find itself isolated and impotent.

From all the above our only conclusion can be that the registration provisions of the Internal Security Act, though ostensibly framed as a simple disclosure regulation, operate in practice to destroy, or at the least permanently and hopelessly cripple, any organization compelled to register. The government's argument that they constitute mere disclosure of information, similar to lobbying or newspaper registration, must be regarded as disingenuous.

2. The registration provisions are designed and operate to eliminate the normal and legitimate activities carried on by organizations compelled to register.

The second basic feature of the registration provisions of the Internal Security Act is that they are primarily designed and operate to suppress, not illegitimate political activity, but the normal and legitimate activity customarily carried on by political associations.

It is necessary at this point to indicate briefly what we mean by "illegitimate" and "legitimate" political activity. We are concerned with methods for achieving political goals, not with the goals themselves. Certain methods, or types of activity, are clearly illegitimate as contrary to the basic principles of the democratic process. Such activity includes treason, sabotage, espionage, creating insubordination in the armed forces, corruption of public officials, the use of force and violence, and similar conduct. In view of U. S. v. Dennis, 341 U. S. 494, we may add, though we disagree, advocacy of force and violence. On the other hand certain types of activity, which may be carried on by the same organization as engages in illegitimate activity, are clearly recognized as legitimate and proper within the democratic framework. Such activity includes all the normal operations of a political association in attempting to persuade by peaceful means a majority of the community to its point of view. At times the dividing line between legitimate and illegitimate activity may be unclear or debatable. With that we are not concerned at this point. The important fact is that the two types of activity are broadly distinguishable and may be carried on by the same organization.

The Communist Party, alleged to be a "Communist-action" organization, has been charged in Section 2 of the Act and elsewhere with engaging in certain illegitimate activity, principally advocacy of the use of force and violence. We are not concerned here with the validity of that charge and, for the purposes of our argument, it may be admitted. So far as appears from Section 2 and other sources it is not asserted that "Communist-front" organizations engage, or at least normally so, in any form of illegitimate activity. Be that as it may, the fact is clear from the record, and is not open to dispute, that organizations subject to the Act do engage in substantial and important legitimate activity. They hold meetings, write and distribute pamphlets, attempt to buttonhole legislators, and pursue a thousand other activities of the kind that is characteristic of voluntary associations in a democratic society.

The registration provisions operate to suppress this legitimate political activity. Moreover, that suppression is not merely an incidental effect of an effort to eliminate illegitimate activity, but rather is the direct and primary objective of the legislation.

(a)

In the first place, as just pointed out, the Act operates to destroy, or hopelessly cripple, any organization compelled to register. The effect is not to punish, or eliminate, some specific illegitimate activity—indeed the "Communist-front" organizations are not even charged with such activity—but to end the life of the organization altogether or to reduce it to impotence. Thus, as the Act goes into operation, a large and significant sector of political activity, carried on by perfectly legitimate methods, is wiped out.

(b)

Equally important, registration is required of an organization, not upon a showing that it has engaged in any form of illegitimate activity, but under standards which are fully applicable to an organization engaging only in wholly legitimate activity.

An organization must register as a "Communist-action" organization if the Board finds that the organization is (1) "substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement"; and (2) "operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement" (§ 3(3)). Plainly direction, domination or control of an organization by a foreign government or foreign organization does not mean that the organization is engaging in illegitimate activity. It may or it may not be, depending upon what it does. But surely much legitimate activity is carried on in the United States under the direction, domination or control of foreign governments and foreign organizations.[10]

[10] The significance of "foreign control" as a ground for suppressing what is otherwise legitimate political activity is a question discussed infra, p. 39.

As to the second half of the standard—advancing the objectives of the world Communist movement—Section 2 asserts that such objectives are "to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world" (§ 2(1)). Plainly this could be done by wholly legitimate methods.

It is true that Section 2 also asserts that the objectives of the world Communist movement are to be attained "by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups * * *, espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary" (§ 2(1)). But these are explicitly designated as means, not objectives; not all of them (e.g. deceit and infiltration) are necessarily illegitimate activity; and it is recognized, by adding "and other means", that the objectives are sought by legitimate as well as illegitimate activity.

From all this it is plain that an organization can be ordered to register as a "Communist-action" organization without any proof whatever that it has engaged in any form of illegitimate activity.

This conclusion is confirmed by an analysis of Section 13(e). In this subsection the framers of the Act set forth eight categories of evidence the Board shall take into consideration in determining whether an organization is a "Communist-action" organization. The eight categories, while not designated as exclusive, were certainly intended to be the principal grounds, and sufficient by themselves, for such a finding. There is no reference in these eight categories to the use of force or violence, espionage, sabotage or similar illegitimate conduct. None of them contain even a suggestion that such illegitimate activity must be found before registration can be compelled.

What has just been said of "Communist-action" organizations is a fortiori true of "Communist front" organizations. The Act defines a "Communist-front" organization as one which is (1) "substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by a Communist-action organization," and (2) "primarily operated for the purpose of giving aid and support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement" (§ 3(4)). Under this standard an organization could be found to be a "Communist-front" without any showing that it had engaged in any illegitimate activity. Nor does Section 13(f)—which lists four categories of evidence which the Board shall consider in finding an organization to be a "Communist-front"—contain anything which requires a finding of such activity.

The application of the registration provisions by the Subversive Activities Control Board and the Court of Appeals in this case confirms the fact that the existence of illegitimate political activity is not a prerequisite to ordering an organization to register, even as a "Communist-action" organization. The Board first finds, substantially in the terms of the Act, that the objectives of the world Communist movement are "the establishment of Communist dictatorships of the proletariat in all countries throughout the world" (Bd. Rep't., p. 9). But it expressly states that these objectives are sought "by any means whether legal or illegal" (Bd. Rep't., p. 6); thus acknowledging that legal methods to obtain the objectives are or may be employed.

The remaining findings of the Board—set forth in great detail—are not primarily concerned with whether the Communist Party has or has not used "illegal means", or, in our terminology, engaged in illegitimate political activity. The findings, grouped under the eight categories of Section 13(e), are directed towards establishing foreign control and advancement of the world Communist movement, irrespective of whether the methods are legitimate or illegitimate. References are made to the advocacy of force and violence, to false swearing, and to other illegitimate conduct. But these are subordinate factors in the result. In essence, the Board finds that the Communist Party is a "Communist-action" organization and orders it to register, not because it has engaged in specified illegitimate activity, but because it finds the Communist Party to be under foreign control and operated generally to advance the world Communist movement.

The Court of Appeals treats the issue in the same fashion (Op. 11-12, 39, 41-42, 56-57, 60-61).

(d)

Further proof that the registration provisions are designed to prevent normal and legitimate political activity appears from an examination of the disabilities imposed by the Act upon registered organizations. These sanctions are applicable to any activity of the organization, quite apart from its character as legitimate or illegitimate. Thus under the labelling provision, all mail disseminated by a registered organization must be marked on the outside with the Communist label, and any radio program so designated, regardless of whether it contains seditious or other illegitimate material. All communication is swept under the ban. Similarly all employment in defense plants is denied and all passports refused.

(e)

Finally, it should be emphasized that suppression of legitimate political activity is not merely incidental to, or a necessary part of, the suppression of illegitimate conduct. Quite the contrary, the elimination of legitimate political activity is the primary purpose of the registration provisions.

For the punishment and control of all serious forms of illegitimate activity adequate laws existed prior to the passage of the Internal Security Act. Treason, espionage, sabotage, insurrection, the use of force and violence, or conspiracy to commit any of them, were all subject to severe criminal penalties. Even advocacy of force and violence, and conspiracy so to advocate, were punishable under the Smith Act. These laws were all enforceable and enforced. They provided protection against all major forms of illegitimate political conduct. If any gaps existed they could readily have been filled by specific legislation. For such purposes the registration provisions were unnecessary.[11]

Furthermore, a system of registration is hardly an effective or appropriate method for dealing with espionage, sabotage, the use of force and violence, or the like. Apart from questions of self-incrimination, the device of registration is wholly unsuitable for coping with such conduct. Congress could scarcely have thought that it was. The object of the registration provisions was to get at conduct not subject to existing law. It was directed toward suppressing those activities of organizations found to be supporting the world Communist movement which were carried on through traditional and legitimate methods of peaceful political action.

3. The impact of the registration provisions carries far beyond the Communist Party and its immediate environs: it seriously restricts freedom of expression throughout the whole liberal movement and indeed the entire population.

Up to this point we have discussed the registration provisions primarily as they apply directly to organizations ordered to register. But it is even more important to consider the impact of these provisions as they affect the whole liberal movement and, beyond that, the entire population. Even the briefest analysis makes clear that the registration provisions gravely impair the essential rights of free association and free expression throughout the country. Many of the factors here have already been pointed out, but certain matters should be emphasized.

[11] For a summary of the applicable legislation see Thomas I. Emerson and David Helfeld, Loyalty Among Government Employees, 58 YALE L. J. 1, 27-8 (1948); Arthur E. Sutherland, Jr., Freedom and Internal Security, 64 HARV. L. REV. 383, 386-8 (1951).

In the first place, the standards as to what constitutes a "Communist-front" organization—both in Sections 3(3) and 13(f)—are so broad that any association or individual dealing with problems with which the Communist Party is also concerned, and not differing sharply from the Communist Party position on that problem, operates under the shadow of the Act and has reason to fear its possible application. "Direction, domination or control" by the Communist Party can be spelled out of the active participation in an organization of a relatively few individuals whose affiliations and views are not known to the members, or whose views differ on other issues than those which the organization is formed to promote. Or it may be inferred from the absence of difference between the Communist Party position and that of the organization on those matters with which the organization is concerned. The standard of "primarily operated to give aid and support" to the world Communist movement embraces almost any action which conforms to the current Communist Party position, or supports the constitutional rights of the Communist Party, or even is opposed to the orthodox government position on such matters as the recognition of Communist China. Indeed, an organization may find itself in trouble by advocating the same position that the government supports, as for example, in upholding the rights of Negroes and other non-political minorities.[12] These standards, moreover, are applied under the relaxed rules of the administrative process, with only limited judicial review.

The impact of the broad standards is accentuated by the severity of the sanctions imposed. The dreadful effect upon a citizen of being officially branded as disloyal and a traitor, the disabilities imposed upon members of registered organizations, the dangers of being trapped in the criminal enforcement machinery, all operate to deter individuals from relations with associations dealing in controversial matters. Likewise, the effect of the Act in exposing individuals to the fierce public and private pressures that have marked our political life for the past decade drastically discourges both freedom of association and individual expression.

The result is that few individuals will care to run the risks involved in participating in controversial issues from a point of view opposed to government policy or consistent with a specific objective also endorsed by the Communist Party.

In the same way voluntary associations engaging in political activity—without which an individual citizen cannot hope to function effectively, and without which a democratic society cannot hope to maintain itself—are badgered, hampered and perhaps even destroyed. Leaders, particularly leaders of moderate temperament, will be hard to find. Individuals will fear to take the risk of joining unless they know all the other members, agree with every policy, and know in advance what action the association will take. Members will be forever suspicious of other members. The association itself must carry on a continuous investigation of all its members and conduct constant purges of left-wing elements. It must weigh every action or policy in the light of possible accusations sure to arise if other organizations adopt a similar policy on the same issue. If an association is even charged by the Department of Justice with being a "Communist-front" organization it will immediately lose all influence and probably soon disintegrate. If an association is ordered to register and dissolves it will be a long time before other members and leaders will be bold enough to form another organization in the same field.

The impact of the registration provisions on the right of association is vividly illustrated by an article in the conservative U. S. News and World Report, published at the time of passage of the Act, giving the following advice to its readers:

"If in Doubt, Don't Join!

"For the person who wants to keep out of trouble in the future, this appears to be good advice:

"Be very careful about organizations joined. Avoid membership in anything that might turn out to be labeled a 'Communist-front' or a 'Communist-dominated' organization. Be equally careful about contributing to organizations. Make sure that any organization getting money from you may not have any possibility of a Communist tie.

"Watch out that your name is not on the list of sponsors of an organization not well known to you. It may even be important to make sure that your name is not on the mailing list of any organization that could turn out to be Communist controlled. The American habit of joining organizations needs now to be restrained." (U. S. News and World Report, September 22, 1950, p. 20.)

It may be suggested that the picture we have given is overdrawn and that administration of the Act will not be pressed to the point here indicated. But experience with similar legislation points the other way. There are forces in the administration of any law of this kind—the need to arouse public opinion, the vested interests and ambitions in the machinery of prosecution, the political pressures engendered—which tend irresistibly to push such legislation to its outermost limits. Furthermore, it is not even necessary that the dangers be real; it is enough that they are felt so.[13]

[13] For an excellent description of the dangers to freedom of expression growing out of the registration provisions, see Zechariah Chafee, Jr., The Registration of "Communist-Front" Organizations in the Mundt-Nixon Bill, 63 Harv. L. Rev. 1382 (1950). See also President Truman's message vetoing the bill which, as passed over his veto, became the Internal Security Act, 96 Cong. Rec. 15629-32; Note, The Internal Security Act of 1950, 51 Col. L. Rev. 606, 607 (1951).

Mr. Justice Frankfurter, referring to the conviction of the Communist Party leaders under the Smith Act, observed:

> "* * * it is self-delusion to think that we can punish them for their advocacy without adding to the risks run by loyal citizens who honestly believe in some of the reforms these defendants advance. It is a sobering fact that in sustaining the conviction before us we can hardly escape restriction on the interchange of ideas." (Dennis v. U. S., 341 U. S. 494, 549.)

What is true of the Smith Act is immeasurably more significant in the Act now before the Court. This aspect of the Act's operation entails the gravest consequences of all. The present case technically involves only the Communist Party. Actually it reaches to the roots of the democratic process.

B. It is not within the power of government under the first amendment to prohibit a political association from engaging in the normal and legitimate forms of political activity. This is true even though such association engages in other activities that are illegitimate, or even though such association is controlled by an organization that engages in illegitimate activity.

The first constitutional issue that emerges from our analysis is a clear-cut and basic one. We have seen that the registration provisions, far from merely requiring the disclosure of information, would in practice operate to destroy or seriously cripple any organization ordered to register. We have also seen that the effect, and in fact the purpose, of these provisions is to eliminate all the normal and legitimate political activities of these organizations. The legislation is particularly crucial because of the effect it would have upon freedom of expression generally.

The issue presented to the Court, therefore, is this: Does the government have power, in view of the First Amendment's prohibition against infringement of freedom of political expression, to adopt measures which prevent a political association from engaging in all the usual types of political activity? Does such power arise from the fact that the organization is tainted with other, illegitimate, activity, or is controlled by a tainted organization?

1. On its face the Act compels registration regardless of whether the organization has engaged in any illegitimate activity whatsoever, or is controlled by an organization that does. Such a requirement plainly violates the First Amendment.

Nothing in the standards laid down by the Act for ordering registration requires a finding that the organization has engaged in any illegitimate activity, or is controlled by an organization that does. The objective of establishing a totalitarian dictatorship does not, as we discuss in more detail later, make all activity directed to that end illegitimate. Similarly, as we also discuss later, direction of an organization from abroad does not necessarily make all its activities illegitimate. Hence the requirement of registration can be imposed upon an organization whose only activity has been entirely within the framework of democratic procedures. This is strikingly true of organizations which may be found to be "Communist-front" organizations.

It should be emphasized, also, that the restraints imposed by the registration provisions do not relate only to one aspect of a political association's activities, such as its use of campaign funds. They operate to suppress all political activity, in any form, by the organization.

On their face, therefore, the registration provisions simply prohibit normal political activity. The sweep of these provisions is so broad, and their effect upon free expression so devastating, that the legislation must be declared on its face squarely in conflict with the First Amendment.

2. Even if we assume that an organization required to register must be shown to have engaged in illegitimate activity, or to be controlled by another that does, it is still clear that the government cannot prevent that organization from engaging in legitimate activity.

Although the Act itself does not require a showing of illegitimate activity, the arguments in support of the registration provisions rest upon the ground that this element is present. Consequently we will assume, for purposes of argument, that the Communist Party is engaging in certain forms of illegitimate political action, principally advocacy of the use of force and violence. We will assume, also, that certain other organizations are "directed, dominated or controlled" by the Communist Party in the narrowest sense of those terms.

Taking these assumptions, it remains clear that the government cannot, in spite of the illegitimate activity, prohibit those activities of a political association which are normal and legitimate. This principle, which is implicit in democratic theory and essential in democratic practice, has been fully accepted and applied by this Court in prior cases.

The leading case is DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353. DeJonge was indicted and convicted for violation of the Oregon Criminal Syndicalism Law. This statute defined criminal syndicalism as "the doctrine which advocates crime, physical violence, sabotage or any unlawful acts or methods as a means of accomplishing or effecting industrial or political change or revolution." It went on to proscribe a series of offenses, including the advocating or teaching of criminal syndicalism, and presiding at or assisting in conducting any meeting of a group which advocated or taught the doctrine. Specifically, DeJonge was charged with assisting in the conduct of a meeting called by the Communist Party, alleged to be an organization advocating criminal syndicalism.

The meeting in question was a public one, conducted in an orderly manner. Its announced purpose was to protect against the conduct of the police in a local strike then in progress. Speeches were made on this and similar subjects. There was no advocacy or teaching of criminal syndicalism.

On the other hand, the meeting was called, organized and conducted by the Communist Party. The Court assumed, for purposes of the case, that the Communist Party was an organization that taught and advocated criminal syndicalism in violation of the Oregon statute. The first speaker "dwelt on the activities of the Young Communist League." DeJonge, the second speaker, was a member of the Communist Party "and went to the meeting to speak in its name." Communist literature, not advocating force or violence, was distributed at the meeting. DeJonge urged the purchase of this literature and also "asked those present to do more work in obtaining members for the Communist Party." (299 U. S. at 359.)

The case thus presented the precise issue with which we are here concerned: Could the state validly prevent the Communist Party, which was guilty of advocating "crime, physical violence, sabotage or [other] unlawful acts or methods," from engaging in the normal political activity of holding an orderly meeting on an issue of public importance? This Court unanimously held not, and reversed the conviction of DeJonge.

Chief Justice Hughes, in a memorable opinion, laid down the doctrine in the plainest terms. Referring to the rights guaranteed by the First Amendment, he said:

> "These rights may be abused by using speech or press or assembly in order to incite to violence and crime. The people through their legislatures may protect themselves against that abuse. But the legislative intervention can find constitutional justification only by dealing with the abuse. The rights themselves must not be curtailed. The greater the importance of safeguarding the community from incitements to the overthrow of our institutions by force and violence, the more imperative is the need to preserve inviolate the constitutional rights of free speech, free press, and free assembly in order to maintain the opportunity for free political discussion, to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes, if desired, may be obtained by peaceful means. Therein lies the security of the Republic, the very foundation of constitutional government." (299 U. S. at 364-365; italics added.)

Speaking of the particular right there at issue—freedom of assembly—Chief Justice Hughes went on:

"It follows from these considerations that, consistently with the Federal constitution, peaceable assembly for lawful discussion cannot be made a crime. The holding of meetings for peaceable political action cannot be proscribed. Those who assist in the conduct of such meetings cannot be branded as criminals on that score. The question, if the rights of free speech and peaceful assembly are to be preserved, is not as to the auspices under which the meeting is held but as to its purpose; not as to the relations of the speakers, but whether their utterances transcend the bounds of the freedom of speech which the Constitution protects. If the persons assembling have committed crimes elsewhere, if they have formed or are engaged in a conspiracy against the public peace and order, they may be prosecuted for their conspiracy or other violation of valid laws. But it is a different matter when the State, instead of prosecuting them for such offenses, seizes upon mere participation in a peaceable assembly and a lawful public discussion as the basis for a criminal charge." (299 U. S. at 365.)

It is true that the statute in the DeJonge case proscribed legitimate political activity by direct criminal sanctions. But it will hardly be suggested that the same repression can be lawfully accomplished by any other state sanction. As Chief Justice Vinson said in American Communications Association v. Douds:

> "We have been reminded that 'It is not often in this country that we now meet with direct and candid efforts to stop speaking or publication as such. Modern inroads on these rights come from associating the speaking with some other factor which the state may regulate so as to bring the whole within official control." (339 U. S. 382, 399, quoting Justice Jackson concurring in Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, 547.)

And later Chief Justice Vinson added, in words peculiarly applicable to this case:

> "But as we have noted, the fact that no direct restraint or punishment is imposed upon speech or assembly does not determine the free speech question. Under some circumstances, indirect 'discouragements' undoubtedly have the same coercive effect upon the exercise of First Amendment rights as imprisonment, fines, injunctions or taxes. A requirement that adherents of particular religious faiths or political parties wear identifying arm-bands, for example, is obviously of this nature." (339 U. S. at 402.)

No other case in this Court, so far as we are aware, has raised the issue as precisely as the DeJonge case. But in numerous other decisions this Court has taken particular pains to enforce the First Amendment's protection of legitimate political activity in situations where other activity was involved which was illegitimate and not subject to constitutional protection.

Thus in Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242, Herndon was convicted under a Georgia insurrection statute which prohibited "any attempt, by persuasion or otherwise, to induce others to join in any combined resistance to the lawful authority of the State." The evidence showed that Herndon, a Communist Party organizer, had procured members for the Communist Party in Atlanta, and that he had in his possession Communist literature which stated that the Communist Party was based "upon the revolutionary theory of Marxism," referred to the need for "overthrow of * * * class rule in the Black Belt" as necessary for the "self-determination" of the Negroes, and contained similar references to the "revolutionary struggle for power." The Supreme Court reversed the conviction, Justice Roberts saying:

> "We are of opinion that the requisite proof is lacking * * *. His membership in the Communist Party and his solicitation of a few members wholly fails to establish an attempt to incite others to insurrection. Indeed, so far as appears, he had but a single copy of the booklet the State claims to be objectionable; that copy he retained. The same may be said with respect to the other books and pamphlets; some of them of more innocent purport. In these circumstances, to make membership in the party and solicitation of members for that party a criminal offense, punishable by death, in the discretion of the jury, is an unwarranted invasion of the right of freedom of speech." (301 U. S. at 259, 261.)

Other cases in which this Court has protected legitimate political activity, carefully separating it from illegitimate activity, include Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359; Schneider v. State, 308 U. S. 147; Hague v. C. I. O., 307 U. S. 496; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88; Taylor v. Mississippi, 319 U. S. 583; Schneiderman v. U. S., 320 U. S. 118; Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516; and Kunz v. New York, 340 U. S. 290. Compare Milwaukee Publishing Co. v. Burleson, 255 U. S. 407, with Donaldson v. Read Magazine, 333 U. S. 178, and Summerfield v. Sunshine Book Co., 221 F. 2d 42 (D. C. Cir.) cert. den. 349 U. S. 921.

All of these cases involved infringement of the right to engage in one particular form of legitimate political activity. The present case a fortiori, involves curtailment of the right to engage in all forms of legitimate activity.

In American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, the Court took occasion to reaffirm the doctrine of the DeJonge case. The Douds case involved the validity of the non-Communist affidavit of the Taft-Hartley Act and the Court, by a narrow margin, upheld that particular restriction upon Communist Party membership. But even the majority was careful to point out—and the implication was clear that otherwise its decision would have been different—that the provision did not prevent all other forms of legitimate activity by the Communist Party. Chief Justice Vinson wrote:

> "Section 9(h) touches only a relative handful of persons, leaving the great majority of persons of the identified affiliations and beliefs completely free from restraint. And it leaves those few who are affected free to maintain their affiliations and beliefs subject only to possible loss of positions which Congress has concluded are being abused to the injury of the public by members of the described group." (339 U. S. at 404.)

And Chief Justice Vinson later, pointing out the "crucial" fact that "the sole effect of the statute upon one who believes in overthrow of the Government by force and violence * * * is that he may be forced to relinquish his position as a union leader" (339 U. S. at 408), expressly adopted as an "apt statement of that principle" the words of Justice Jackson's concurring opinion:

> "The Act does not suppress or outlaw the Communist Party, nor prohibit it or its members from engaging in any aboveboard activity normal in party struggles under our political system. It may continue to nominate candidiates, hold meetings, conduct campaigns and issue propaganda, just as other parties may. No individual is forbidden to be or to become a philosophical Communist or a full-fledged member of the Party. No one is penalized for writing or speaking in favor of the Party or its philosophy. Also, the Act does not require or forbid anything whatever to any person merely because he is a member of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party. It applies only to one who becomes an officer of a labor union." (339 U. S. at 408, 434).

The registration provisions, of course, do precisely what the Court held it was "crucial" that the Taft-Hartley Act did not do.

It should be particularly noted that the principle of the DeJonge case does not rest upon any application of the clear and present danger test. The Court in the DeJonge case did not rely upon or even mention that test. Nor was it invoked in this connection in the Herndon case. The reason is that any consequences arising from the legitimate activity repressed here, as in the DeJonge case—the holding of peaceful meetings, the support of candidates in elections, the issuance of leaflets and books containing normal political discussion—cannot be "an evil that Congress has a right to prevent." If such normal political conduct could be considered as giving rise to an "evil," then there would be no meaning left to the First Amendment. Consequently the findings of Congress, the Board and the lower court with respect to clear and present danger are wholly irrelevant to the issue now before the Court. For that reason we do not attempt to discuss clear and present danger or undertake to distinguish the Dennis case on this point.

A fortiori, any test of "reasonableness," as employed in the lower court and urged by the government here, is inapplicable under the DeJonge rule. Surely Congress cannot restrict or suppress all the basic rights of lawful political expression on the part of any group under a theory that the restrictions are "reasonable".

Finally, it should be added that the principle of the DeJonge case is compelled by the fundamental theory of the First Amendment and is essential to the effective realization of that theory in a practical democracy.

In broad terms the question, as presented to the Court under the assumptions we are now making, is whether First Amendment freedoms must be extended to groups whose ultimate aims or some of whose immediate methods are antidemocratic. The answer in democratic theory is that they must. It is true that Milton, the first to expound the modern theory of free speech, would have withheld its benefits from Roman Catholics.[14] But that qualification has been abandoned by most later advocates of the doctrine. A classic statement of the prevailing view is that of Justice Holmes:

> "If in the long run the beliefs expressed in proletarian dictatorship are destined to be accepted by the dominant forces of the community, the only meaning of free speech is that they should be given their chance and have their way." Gitlow v. N. Y., 268 U. S. 652, 673.

The reasoning is that everyone in a democratic community should have equal rights to persuade others to his view, so long as he stays within the framework of democratic procedures. This does not prevent punishment of conduct in violation of that process; but it does require everyone to have access to those procedures. Only thus can a democratic society function and retain its vitality. All in such a society have a right to speak and a right to hear all points of view. The radical views of those who feel and act militantly are as important as the moderate views of those who would preserve the status quo. The suppression of any point of view not only hinders peaceful social change but gives no outlet to the militant group other than attempted violent destruction of the society which seeks to curb it.

Extension of the right of free expression to anti-democratic groups is likewise essential from a practical point of view. After all, who is to decide whether a particular group is anti-democratic or not? How are we to be sure the label will not be applied to all groups considered radical—Socialists, economic planners, and others? There are always strong pressures in a political community to carry such restrictions far beyond any original intention. They become weapons in a partisan political struggle, too readily and too often invoked, and ultimately the rights of all minorities are in jeopardy.

Suppression of the right of any group to freedom of expression cannot fail to exert an unhealthy effect upon the operation of a democratic community. It undermines the moral strength of what should be held as a fundamental principle and reduces that principle to a rule of political manipulation. By a kind of Gresham's law, it drives out of circulation real freedom of expression and lessens its value to all.

The application of the DeJonge principle to the case at bar cannot admit of doubt. The fact that the Communist Party may advocate the use of force and violence, or engage in other illegitimate activity, cannot provide grounds for requiring it to register, thereby repressing "peaceable assembly and a lawful public discussion," or other legitimate activity. As to "Communist-front" organizations their only connection with illegitimate conduct is that they are found to be "substantially directed, dominated or controlled" by the Communist Party. A fortiori, they cannot under the DeJonge rule be driven by government restrictions to impotence or collapse.

3. The justifications for the registration provisions advanced in the Internal Security Act and by the government in argument here are wholly inadequate as reasons for not following the foregoing principles in this case.

There remains only to consider, briefly, whether certain justifications advanced in support of the Act give any reason for not applying the accepted rule in this case.

So far as appears, the framers of the Act had in mind two major reasons for attempting to suppress the legitimate activities of "Communist-action" and "Communist-front" organizations. Both are embodied in the definitions or standards of Section 3(3) and 3(4). One is that these organizations operate to "advance the objectives" of, or give "aid and support" to, the world Communist movement. The other is that "Communist-action" organizations are "substantially directed, dominated or controlled" by a foreign government or organization, and "Communist-front" organizations are "substantially directed, dominated or controlled" by a "Communist-action" organization. We will discuss these in turn.

(a) Advancing the Objectives of the World Communist Movement

The objective of the world Communist movement, according to Section 2 of the Act, is the establishment of totalitarian dictatorships in various countries of the world, including the United States. To the extent that this objective is pursued through peaceful and democratic means—that is, by legitimate political activity—such action is protected by the First Amendment from government interference. This is simply one aspect of the proposition, already discussed, that rights under the First Amendment must be extended to anti-democratic groups.

The government is properly concerned with methods of political action. Thus, it has power to prevent any person from employing anti-democratic methods to obtain political goals. But it has no power to restrict political activities merely because they are directed toward achieving certain forms of political organization, however abhorrent. It cannot interfere with persons seeking to establish, by democratic methods, a form of government that is parliamentarian, socialist, communist, fascist or any other—democratic or not.

Hence the fact that organizations are "advancing the objectives" of, or giving "aid and support" to, the world Communist movement cannot be a justification for suppressing the legitimate activities of these organizations.

(b) Foreign Control

We need not attempt to decide under what circumstances, if any, the existence of "foreign control" might empower the government to impose upon political expression restrictions which would otherwise be prohibited by the First Amendment. For it is clear, we submit, that the kind of "foreign control" envisaged by the Internal Security Act and found by the Board in this case cannot operate to change the DeJonge rule or justify suppression of all normal political activities.

The Act employs the terms "directed, dominated or controlled," and the Board couches its findings in the same language; but it is essential to consider carefully how those terms are used and how they are being applied. The character of the "foreign control" which stamps an organization as a "Communist-action" group becomes apparent from an examination of the standards embodied in Section 13(e). These authorize the Board to rely on such matters as the extent to which the activities of an alleged "Communist-action" organization are performed "to effectuate the policies" of a foreign government; the extent to which its views "do not deviate from those of such foreign government"; the extent to which it sends "representatives to any foreign country for instruction or training in the principles, policies, strategy, or tactics" of the world Communist movement; and the extent to which it "reports" to a foreign government. . . .

Similarly the Board in reaching its finding of "direction, domination and control" relied upon such matters as that "a substantial number of Respondent's present leaders * * * have been to the Soviet Union on numerous occasions on Party business and have been indoctrinated and trained in the Soviet Union on Russian strategy and policies" (Bd. Rep't, p. 20); that "among the major activities of Respondent are teaching, advocacy, and agitation in opposition to what Respondent calls United States imperialism" (Bd.

Rep't, p. 44); that "the Daily Worker is the counterpart in the United States of the Soviet Union organ Pravda" (Bd. Rep't, p. 61); that "Respondent has campaigned for and championed reforms such as shorter working hours, non-militarization of youth and Negro rights" (Bd. Rep't, p. 77); that Respondent exchanged "greetings" with other Communist parties (Bd. Rep't, pp. 95-98); and that the "use of Party names or aliases for the purpose of concealing membership and activities in the CPUSA has been a widespread and continuous practice" (Bd. Rep't, p. 109). Scores of similar findings form an integral part of the Board's conclusion. It is to be noted, however, that the Board found no evidence of financial support from abroad since 1940, except the receipt of some book plates and English translations from International Publishers (Bd. Rep't, p. 88).

Of course, the degree of "foreign control" exercised over a "Communist-front" organization—where the "control" operates indirectly through a "Communist-action" organization—is even more remote and unsubstantial.

To say that by reason of "foreign control" of such a character a domestic organization can be prevented from engaging in legitimate political activity would strike at the heart of the First Amendment. Such a doctrine would give the government power to curb the legitimate activity of almost any organization with international affiliations. For most such organizations have relations with foreign counterparts and attempt to carry out policies determined at the international level. It would authorize government control even over organizations formed to support the United Nations or its subsidiary groups. It would furnish the basis for state power over religious organizations with international affiliations, such as the Roman Catholic Church and the Zionist organizations whose rights also depend upon the First Amendment. It would apply in other areas—to scientific, cultural, recreational and vocational groups—thus in effect authorizing the repression of any free expression and association on an international scale. And it would endanger organizations with no international affiliation of their own but which were influenced by or worked together with groups having an international character.

Surely the protection of the First Amendment cannot be so limited. To do so would be especially unfortunate at a time when relations between international groups are crucial to a solution of the grave problems that confront the world.

The fact is that any reason for interfering with First Amendment rights of organizations under "foreign control" is completely absent in the case of voluntary associations operating within the United States. Such associations are masters of their own decisions. Neither they nor their members are subject to any physical or police control from abroad. The organization operates under American laws, in an American environment, subject to everyday American customs, ideas and traditions and it must secure the approval of American public opinion. Apart from financial contributions—a special issue, but not one involved here—the kind of "control" exercised by a foreign government or organization is ideological in character. The American association or individual can always withdraw. What is designated by the Act as "control", therefore, is in reality little more than ideological influence. Again, this is particularly true of so-called "Communist-front" organizations.

For these reasons, we submit, the argument based on "foreign control" cannot alter or qualify the principle of the First Amendment that political associations cannot be refused the right to engage in legitimate activity.

C. The registration provisions are invalid under the First Amendment because they are not narrowly drawn to meet the problem Congress ostensibly undertook to solve.

Even if we assume the power of Congress to compel the Communist Party and organizations under its control to register with the Department of Justice, the Act in its present form is invalid as not being narrowly drawn to meet the specific abuses Congress purported to correct. It is well-settled law that legislation impinging upon rights protected by the First Amendment must be narrowly framed to meet the specific abuse and must not "sweep within its orbit" a mass of other matters with which the Congress has no power to concern itself. Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U. S. 444; Schneider v. State, 308 U. S. 147; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296; U. S. v. C. I. O., 335 U. S. 106; Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495.

The principle is vital to the maintenance of the protections afforded by the First Amendment. Citizens in a modern democratic nation, dependent as they are for their livelihood and welfare upon government and private authority, and vulnerable as they are to the pressures of orthodox opinion, are readily affected by official action directed at freedom of expression. Most of us shrink—more than we should perhaps—from tangling with government power, pitting our resources against the government in a criminal prosecution, or staking our reputation and career upon the outcome of an official proceeding. It is not easy, in our complicated society, to draft legislation which meets precisely a current abuse and does not infringe upon rights and privileges which the government is bound to leave alone. But the legislature must conform to a strict standard and it is the function and obligation of the courts to hold it to that standard.

We submit that Congress has not met that standard in this legislation. We refer the Court to the analysis of the registration provisions set forth above, particularly that part showing the effect of the legislation upon the liberal movement and upon freedom of opinion generally. At this point we note simply a few outstanding features of the Act:

(1) The standards established for determining what organizations must register are so loose as to include numerous organizations only remotely or coincidentally related to the Communist Party (§§ 3(3), (4), 13(e), (f)).

(2) The standards for membership in the Communist Party, which determine who must register publicly with the Department of Justice on pain of cumulative penalties, and for participation in the Communist Party, which determine who must be recorded on the books of the Communist Party, are so vague as to include numerous individuals only casually related to the Communist Party (§ 5 of the Communist Control Act).

(3) All these standards must be considered, not only as they may eventually be refined by the courts, but as they infringe on freedom of expression through raising a reasonable possibility of subjecting an individual or an organization to governmental action.

(4) The severity of the deprivations imposed by the Act make individuals reluctant to run the risk of incurring or even testing them.

(5) The deterrent effect of the drastic criminal provisions by which the registration provisions are enforced is bound to prevent many individuals from joining or assuming leadership in an organization likely to be the object of a proceeding to force registration.

(6) Although Congress insists that the purpose of the registration provisions is only to disclose the source of propaganda activities, the requirement that every member of a registered organization (including "Communist-front" organizations) be named in the open files of the Department of Justice subjects numerous individuals to exposure and stigma that is unnecessary to achieve the announced purpose.

(7) The impact upon voluntary associations makes their operation in controversial fields hazardous and ineffective.

For these and other reasons stated previously we urge the Court to strike down the registration provisions as not complying with the rule that such legislation must be narrowly drawn and not operate to hamper or destroy vital rights protected by the First Amendment.

D. Conclusion on the First Amendment.

The importance of the issues raised under the First Amendment can hardly be overstated. The legislation now before the Court infringes upon freedom of expression to a degree never before approached by an act of Congress. The Court must decide whether legitimate activities of voluntary associations can be curtailed and suppressed because the association is otherwise tainted or is influenced by a tainted organization. It must decide whether sweeping restrictions operating to harass free expression of the liberal movement and indeed the whole population will be sustained because they are ostensibly directed at the Communist movement. The case raises a further question of increasing significance in America—the extent to which a growing mass of non-criminal, indirect sanctions can be employed by government to vex and obstruct unorthodox but legitimate political activity.

We respectfully submit that the issues and the times call for a firm adherence to the fundamental purposes that the First Amendment was designed to serve.

POINT II

The Act is invalid as violative of the privilege against self-incrimination.

The Internal Security Act, in its preamble, states it is designed to "protect the United States" through the device of "requiring registration of Communist organizations". Accordingly, the registration and reporting provisions to be found in Sections 7 and 8 of the Act are the heart of the legislation. They specify, inter alia, that, within designated periods of time (Section 7(c)), Communist-action organizations must register on forms prescribed by the Attorney-General (Section 7(a), (b)), such registration to be accompanied by a statement to contain, among other items of information:

> "* * * the name and last-known address of each individual who was a member of the organization at any time during the period of twelve full calendar months preceding the filing of such statement" (Section 7(d) (4)).

It is further prescribed that:

> "It shall be the duty of each Communist-action organization registered under this section to keep, in such manner and form as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, accurate records of the names and addresses of the members of such organization and of persons who actively participate in the activities of such organization" (Section 7(f) (2)).

The principal duty to supply the described information apparently falls upon the organization. If the organization fails to do so:

> "* * * it shall be the duty of the executive officer (or individual performing the ordinary and usual duties of an executive officer) and of the secretary (or individual performing the ordinary and usual duties of a secretary) of such organization, and of such officer or officers of such organization as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, to register for such organization, to file such registration statement, or to file such annual report, as the case may be" (Section 7(h)).

And if an organization is found to be a Communist-action organization, but it does not register as such, or if registered, fails to report all its members, then any individual whose membership in such organization is not reported for either of these reasons is obliged to register within a designated period of time with the Attorney General as a member of the organization (Section 8(a), (b). Failure by the individual member so to register is punishable by a maximum fine of $10,000 and/or maximum imprisonment of five years, and "each day of failure to register, whether on the part of the organization or any individual, shall constitute a separate offense" (Section 15(a) (2).[15]

The briefs of the parties, and the opinions below, have discussed fully those matters pertaining to the validity of the disclosures the Act compels of an organization and its officers. We direct our attention to that phase of the Act which compels individual members of an "action" organization to disclose such membership because we consider that this feature of the Act most flagrantly infringes Fifth Amendment guarantees in that it would compel individuals to profess membership in an organization which, by legislation ranging from the Smith Act to the Internal Security Act to the statute outlawing the Communist Party, has [15] It is not clear from the Act whether this penalty follows merely upon failure of a member to register in the described circumstances, or whether, after such failure, a final order directing the individual to register under Section 13 is required and prosecution under Section 15 is limited to instances of refusal to register in the face of such an individual registration order.

again and again been branded a criminal conspiracy by the Congress.

It is settled beyond dispute that, upon a proper claim of privilege, disclosure of membership in the Communist Party cannot be compelled. Quinn v. United States, 349 U. S. 155; Emspak v. United States, 349 U. S. 190; Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159. In view of the nature of organizations required to be registered as a Communist-action group under the Act (see Sections 2, 3(3), 4, 13(e)), it is likewise clear that, again upon a proper claim of privilege, an individual could not be compelled to disclose his membership in such an organization. That the Act bars the use of such disclosure as evidence against the individual in a subsequent criminal proceeding (Section 4(f)) does not obviate the Act's incompatibility with the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination since the limited immunity offered by the Act falls short of the reach of the privilege. United States v. Bryan, 339 U. S. 323; Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547.

And so, on the most clearly settled principles, it appears that the key registration aspect of the Act seeks to compel a self-disclosure of criminality which the Fifth Amendment prohibits. The Board urges that this violation is, however, not properly now at issue because it is here raised by petitioner and not by a member to whom the privilege is personal,[16] and, further because it is premature since the occasion for self-disclosure may never arise if the organization or its officers choose to list the membership.

The privilege is, of course, personal. Rogers v. United States, 340 U. S. 367. But so is freedom of association and expression; yet this Court recognized the standing of an unincorporated association, as the aggregate of its members and their rights, to assert those personal constitutional rights of its membership. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123. Moreover, since the privilege of the petitioner's members is violated by the Act, petitioner has standing to do so even apart from its status in law as the aggregate of its membership; the proposed injury to a constitutional right of petitioner's members because of membership, interferes with present and future membership in the petitioner organization thereby investing petitioner with standing to complain of that injury. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, supra; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, etc., 268 U. S. 510; Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, 245 U. S. 229.

The timeliness of presently determining the constitutionality of the self-disclosure feature of the Act appears not only from the nature of the disclosure required by the Act but, more urgently, from the probability that if that determination is not made now, it may never be made.

If the Congress had passed a statute requiring each citizen to file with the Department of Justice on the first of each year a complete disclosure of all federal offenses committed by him during the preceding year, it could hardly be seriously urged that the citizen's exclusive remedy was to claim his privilege on the return date; the hypothetical statute, as the Act here, on its face calls for an incriminating disclosure and the formality of the claim of individual privilege is timely satisfied when the legislation is challenged. This is not a case where the question on its face is innocuous or where a non-incriminating answer might be possible in some individual case. If this were so, it might be necessary to await the individual claim of the privilege and consider the application of the Act in context. But here the question on its face and the only answer solicited are incriminating; in the circumstances the claim of privilege is not only unnecessary, but, as well, a gratuitous injury to the one required to claim his privilege as a condition to testing the statute.

Moreover, wherever the self-disclosure requirement of the Act becomes operative, the member is confronted with great difficulties as to when, if ever, if not now, he may claim the Act offends the privilege. Section 8 requires individual membership registration within 60 days after the Communist-action organization of which he is a member is declared by final order to be such an organization where it fails to register (Section 8(a)), or, where it registers but does not list an individual's membership, within 60 days of the member's knowledge of its registration and its failure to list his membership (Section 8(b)). If, within these preseribed periods, the member fails to disclose his membership or to file a claim of privilege, he may be deemed to have waived the privilege thereafter. Cf. Roger v. United States, supra. If, on the other hand, he files a claim of privilege within the specified time, although not individually requested to designate membership, he will have, in effect, directed attention to his possible membership and thereby, at the least, supplied a lead to his possible criminal involvement, and, at the most, exposed himself to the many legal, social, and economic sanctions imposed today upon a claim of privilege. Indeed, in view of the purposes of this legislation, a claim of privilege, which the respondent argues is indispensable to considering the constitutional question here treated, would probably make unnecessary any further action by the Justice Department against the claimant, thereby making it impossible according to the respondent's position, ever to obtain an adjudication by a member of whether the Act violates his guarantee against self-incrimination. In sum, if that feature of the Act requiring self-disclosure by members is not tested against the Fifth Amendment now, it may never be (Cf. Barrows v. Jackson, 342 U. S. 249, 257); or, if delayed until some time when the member may or must claim his privilege, great doubts remain as to when he may or must do so and challenging the Act is conditioned on unnecessary and serious injury to the claimant.

As Mr. Justice Frankfurter pointed out in Joint-Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, supra, at 156:

> "If the ultimate impact of the challenged action on the petitioner is sufficiently probable and not too distant, and if the procedure by which that ultimate action may be questioned is too onerous or hazardous, 'standing' is given to challenge the action at a preliminary stage. Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197; Santa Fe Pac. R. Co. v. Lane, 244 U. S. 492; see Waite v. Macy, 246 U. S. 606. It is well settled that equity will enjoin enforcement of criminal statutes found to be unconstitutional 'when it is found to be essential to the protection of the property rights, as to which the jurisdiction of a court of equity has been invoked.' E.g., Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 605, 621. And if the determination challenged creates a status which enforces a course of conduct through penal sanctions, a litigant need not subject himself to the penalties to challenge the determination. LaCrosse Telephone Corp. v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 336 U. S. 18; Shields v. Utah Idaho Central R. Co., 305 U. S. 177."

No doubt the resolution of constitutional problems should be deferred until required by the necessities of a case. But where, as here, the legislation on its face, and in its essentials, involves clear violation of a constitutional guarantee, the earliest reasonably appropriate occasion for reviewing that legislation is the timely occasion therefor (cf. Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88); especially where, as here, awaiting the ultimate refinement of the issue causes confusion and injury.

CONCLUSION

In the decade just ended American freedom suffered severe curtailment. Rights and privileges deemed well established at the beginning of the decade became insecure or non-existent. The result has been grave hurt to the country and the people.

At home, a new look was being given to the face of our democracy in the name of national security. Criticism was muted, opposition was practically silenced and the drive to conformity succeeded so far as to make applicable Mr. Justice Jackson's observation that the freedom to differ on "things that do not matter much" is "but the shadow of freedom." (West Virginia State Board of Education v. Burnette, 319 U. S. 624, 642.) An entire generation of the young, normally the promise of the future progress, was frightened into intellectual and political sterility, presenting the paradox of naturally rebellious youth more conservative than their elders. Mutual hatreds and suspicions were generated and national self-confidence was undermined. And all of this at a time when fresh thought, robust challenge and new, creative approaches were needed if domestic disaster and an atomic holocaust were to be averted. At one stage the picture became so dark that former Ambassador George J. Kennan felt forced to warn:

> "We can make no greater mistake, than to imagine that the tendencies which in other countries have led to the nightmare of totalitarianism will, as they appear in our midst, politely pause—out of some delicate respect for American tradition—at the point where they begin to affect our independence of mind and belief." (Convocation Address at Notre Dame University, New Republic, June 1, 1953.)

Abroad, America's moral prestige and standing declined precipitately. Our intentions and professions began to be questioned. This brave, kindly, generous deeply pacific, democratic people began to look to the outside world as frightened, harsh, belligerent and on the primrose path to authoritarianism. Even to our best friends the junior Senator from Wisconsin became the symbol of a people the world once admired for its love of freedom.

There are signs that a revulsion is setting in against the extravagances of the past decade, and that a morning-after mood is developing. The outrages that have been perpetrated in the name of national security are being exposed. Congressional investigations, not into belief and association, but into the functioning of the measures and practices that have produced these outrages are taking place. The most sensitive are filled with shame and remorse at the follies that have been committed, and there is a fairly widespread determination to put a halt to them and make amends.

The Courts are playing a part in this national soul-searching. The decisions in Quinn, Emspak, Lattimore, Schachtman, Nathan, Lamont, Sheiner and others show a determination to restore constitutional rights and privileges to their former vigor. But so long as the obnoxious measures remain unrepealed and the practices unrepudiated there is the danger that their sponsors may resort and revert to them. This case presents this Court with the opportunity of eliminating one of the most obnoxious.

No western democracy has outlawed the Communist Party, though in some of them it polls upwards of twenty per cent of the national vote. The whole world is watching to see whether our recovery from the past decade's follies is genuine and lasting or whether the most powerful of the democracies is still so unsure of itself that it feels compelled to turn on its finest heritage and suppress a group whom the New York Times as long ago as August 22, 1950 called a "puny band". For, as the Chief Justice said at the American Bar Association Convention on August 21, 1955:

"But we now live in a different kind of world, an ideological world which disagrees violently on the proper relationship between the individual and the state, and in which there is a constant struggle for the minds and hearts of people.

We, and other free countries, are endeavoring to demonstrate that freedom and dignity for all constitute the only sound basis for world peace.

In such a gigantic struggle, where the eyes of a critical world are constantly upon everyone, the power of example is far more forceful than that of precept.

If the world is made to see that the provisions of our Constitution guaranteeing human rights are living things, enjoyed by all Americans, and enforceable in our courts everywhere, it will do much to turn the tide in our favor and therefore toward peace." (New York Times, Aug. 22, 1955.)

To the limits of its resources the National Lawyers Guild, which has itself been made to feel the lash of official disapproval, has in the course of the years defended the constitutional and civil liberties of a variety of people. In doing so the Guild has always believed that it was defending the Constitution, the Bill of Rights and our traditional freedom. To us, freedom is stripped of meaning if those whose views and hopes differ from ours are not allowed to urge their own. The right to think and speak freely is not only a precious good in itself, but has great social utility. Even ideas and projects which are ultimately proved false and wrong can be useful goads to true and right action. Mr. Justice Douglas' aphorism reaches the very heart of this case:

"We must be willing to meet an idea at the level of argument and counter argument, not at the police level of suppression." ("The Spoken Word", Columbia University Radio Program, as reported in the New York Times, October 24, 1954.)

With deepest sincerity we suggest that this Court can do much to restore freedom at home and our moral prestige and standing abroad by reversing the judgment below.

COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Petitioner,

v.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, AMICUS CURIAE

Interest of Amicus

The American Civil Liberties Union, appearing herein with the consent of both parties filed with the Clerk of this Court, is a nationwide nonpartisan organization devoted solely to the protection and advancement of the Constitutional rights fundamental to the democratic way of life. It has no other program, either political, economic, social, or philosophical.

Amicus' primary concern with the instant case is that this Court's validation of the order here involved would cause a contraction in freedom to exchange political opinions in America, particularly on international issues, and a loss in the cognate freedom to associate for the purpose of political expression. The instant order and statute not only would establish a precedent lessening the protection of the First Amendment guarantee for all Americans, but would, here and now, spread a restraint far beyond petitioner and its members, over the rights of expression and association of Americans generally.

The case now before this Court has, to amicus, an enhanced importance because it believes there has been a widespread disregard of First Amendment principles in Governmental practices in the past few years, which has for one reason or another escaped judicial scrutiny. Judicial guidance back to First Amendment principles by invalidation of the instant order would be most opportune and salutary; it would help revive the traditions and patterns of free thought, free expression, and free association which in day by day practice are being transformed and corrupted from their constitutionally-intended design.

Amicus recognizes that the Communist Party, petitioner herein, has a dual nature, engaging publicly in the forms of expression and association usual to political parties and organizations, but also engaging covertly in anti-democratic methods in aid of the aims of Soviet Russia, to the extent even, it appears, of securing the commission of espionage against the United States. Amicus, believing the Government must take vigorous measures against the latter type of activities, is of course concerned solely with protection of the rights of petitioner in the first role, because of the effect of restraints in this area on principles and practices affecting freedom of expression and association for all Americans.

Amicus is also fully aware that private groups and individuals may, in their exercise of their freedom of expression and association, find it advisable privately to adopt restrictions against petitioner and its members. Indeed, amicus has since 1940 barred from all positions in its organization persons who are members or accept the discipline of the Communist Party. However, amicus emphasizes, particularly in connection with the instant case, that preservation of a distinction between the Government's sphere and the individual's is one of the essential points of difference between democracy and totalitarianism. What we are here seeking to maintain is the right of the individual to come to his own independent determinations in the field of opinion and political association, free from Government direction and control.

Statement of the Case

The facts, proceedings, and statutes here involved are set forth in detail in the briefs of the parties. Here they will be briefly summarized so far as relevant to the instant argument.

The Statute

The Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 [1] provides for the establishment of the Subversive Activities Control Board (hereinafter called SACB) with the duty of determining, upon petition of the Attorney General of the United States, whether an organization is a "Communist-action organization" as defined in the Act (Section 13). A "Communist-action organization" is defined as "any organization in the United States * * * which (i) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, and (ii) operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement as referred to in section 2 of this title." (Section 3(3)(a).)

[1] 64 Stat. 987, 50 U. S. C. 781 ff., hereinafter termed The Act.

The "world Communist movement", on which the above definition hinges, is described at length in section 2. In its most important passages section 2 states:

> (1) There exists a world Communist movement which, in its origins, its development, and its present practice, is a world-wide revolutionary movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world through the medium of a world-wide Communist organization.
>
> (2) The establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship in any country results in the suppression of all opposition to the party in power, the subordination of the rights of individuals to the state, the denial of fundamental rights and liberties which are characteristic of a representative form of government, such as freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, and of religious worship, and results in the maintenance of control over the people through fear, terrorism, and brutality
>
>
> (5) The Communist dictatorship of such foreign country, in exercising such direction and control and in furthering the purposes of the world Communist movement, establishes or causes the establishment of, and utilizes, in various countries, action organizations which are not free and independent organizations, but are sections of a world-wide Communist organization and are controlled, directed, and subject to the discipline of the Communist dictatorship of such foreign country.
> (6) The Communist action organizations so established and utilized in various countries, acting under such control, direction, and discipline, endeavor to carry out the objective of the world Communist movement by bringing about the overthrow of existing governments by any available means, including force if necessary, and setting up Communist totalitarian dictatorships which will be subservient to the most powerful existing Communist totalitarian dictatorship. Although such organizations usually designate themselves as political parties, they are in fact constituent elements of the world-wide Communist movement and promote the objectives of such movement by conspiratorial and coercive tactics, instead of through the democratic processes of a free elective system or through the freedom-preserving means employed by a political party which operates as an agency by which people govern themselves * * *.

(9) In the United States those individuals who knowingly and willfully participate in the world Communist movement, when they so participate, in effect repudiate their allegiance to the United States, and in effect transfer their allegiance to the foreign country in which is vested the direction and control of the world Communist movement * * *.

(11) The agents of communism have devised clever and ruthless espionage and sabotage tactics which are carried out in many instances in form or manner successfully evasive of existing law.

"In determining whether any organization is a 'Communist-action organization'," as defined in Section 13, with reference back to Section 2, the Board is directed to "take into consideration" among other things, and did in the instant case place major emphasis on, "the extent to which its views and policies do not deviate from those of such foreign government (Russia)" (Section 13(e)(2)).

An organization found to be a "Communist-action organization" by SACB must register, in registers "kept and maintained in such manner as to be open for public inspection" (Section 9(b)), the names and addresses of all officers and members during the preceding year, the sources of all moneys received and the purposes for which expended, and a list of printing presses and similar machines in which the organization has an interest (Section 7).

Further, the Act provides that any publication disseminated by the organization through the mails or any instru-mentality of interstate or foreign commerce, must bear on its wrapper as well as its text the notation "Disseminated by _____, a Communist organization", and all broadcasts are to be preceded by the announcement: "The following program is sponsored by _____, a Communist organization", with the name of the organization in place of the blank (Section 10).

The Act also has a provision on tax deductions and exemptions for an organization found to be a "Communist-action organization" (Section 11); and it imposes specific disabilities on its members with respect to employment in the Government or defense facilities (Section 5); passports (Section 6); and if they are aliens, exclusion, deportation, naturalization and denaturalization (Sections 22, 25).

Proceedings

Upon the Attorney General's filing of a petition with the SACB on September 23, 1950 (R. 143), a SACB panel commenced hearings on April 23, 1951 to determine whether the Communist Party of the United States was a "Communist-action organization" (R. 1). On April 20, 1953 SACB issued its order requiring petitioner to register as a "Communist-action organization", accompanied by its findings and opinion, as required by Section 13(g) of the Act (R. 138, 1). Pursuant to Section 14 of the Act, the Communist Party petitioned the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to set aside the SACB order (R. 2078). On December 23, 1954 that Court entered its opinion and judgment approving the SACB order against petitioner (R. 2078); and this Court, pursuant to Section 14(a) of the Act and 28 U. S. Code 2154, granted the petitioner's petition for a writ of certiorari to review that judgment and opinion.

Question to Be Argued

Because amicus believes that the most far-reaching effects from the civil liberties standpoint, of validation of the instant order would be experienced in the First Amendment area of freedom of thought, expression, and association, this brief will be devoted exclusively to the argument that the registration order against petitioner, and the provision of the Act for registration of "Communist-action organizations" as here interpreted, violate the First Amendment to the Constitution.

Summary of Argument

A. While force and violence has been found to be the covert and ultimate pattern of the Communist Party, it must be borne in mind that the Party's contact with the public is as a political organization expressing non-revolutionary and non-violent opinions on the social and political issues of the day.

The registration requirement now before the Court is unprecedented in purpose and effect relative to previous legislation dealing with the Communist Party, which had restrained either harmful acts or advocacy of forceful overthrow of the government. In contrast, as the legislative history of the instant statute unmistakably shows, the registration requirement is primarily intended to affect petitioner and its members in their public political functioning, restricting them in their expression of the non-revolutionary opinions on everyday political issues which they customarily address to the public, and in their associations for the purpose of such expression.

The Government's public stigmatization, through the registration order, of petitioner and its members as traitorous, obviously would deter and discourage people outside the Communist Party from giving consideration or even a hearing to their views notwithstanding the non-violent character of the opinions disseminated to the public. Thus, the registration order diminishes a crucial component of the First Amendment right to expression: the right to address listeners, so far as they are willing, without Government control or interference. The governmental stigmatization would also affect the First Amendment rights of petitioner, its members, and the public generally, by discouraging any association in or with the Communist Party, and thus also of expression through it; and again, the impact would be primarily in the area of association for the purpose of expressing non-revolutionary, political opinions. For the people influenced by the Government stamp of treason on the organization and its members would tend to be those who might, without this Governmental intervention, be interested in the peacable political opinions expressed by the Party and its members; persons in sympathy with violent overthrow of the Government or overtly pro-Soviet aims would hardly be influenced against the Party or its members by the "Communist-action" designation.

B. The decisions of this Court realistically recognize that Governmental imposition of a stigma is an exertion of Governmental force and coercion, and that such an exercise of Government power must meet the tests of the First Amendment. The fact that the opprobrious designation may be true does not make it any the less a Governmental restraint within the purview of the First Amendment.

C. The Government's burdening and restricting the freedom to associate and to express opinions, though the opinions do not in themselves create a danger, is contrary to fundamental First Amendment principle. This Court emphasized in DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353, that freedom of expression depends for its preservation on the principle that the Government has power to control expression only if its content is outside the bounds of speech protected by the Constitution. The salient consideration in Governmental restriction of expression is the content, not the source. The rationale of the registration requirement here at issue is in direct contradiction to the DeJonge precept, for it is intended to and does diminish the right of expression and association of a Communist regardless of his subject, and in particular negates his freedom of expression through discouraging consideration or even a hearing of any of his opinions. This subversion of the DeJonge doctrine has a large significance because it means a rejection of our basic Constitutional tenet that truth will be sifted from error by a free debate of ideas. Instead of confidence in the free exchange of ideas as the way to truth, this Act assumes that exposure to error is likely to be fatal to the discovery of truth and that the American public cannot, without Government identification of the false prophets, determine whether ideas are false or true.

D. The provisions of section 10 of the Act for the labeling of petitioner's publications and their wrappers with a label reflecting the SACB findings as to its opprobrious nature, and for a similar announcement prior to any broadcast by petitioner, further effectuate the purpose of attaching a public stigma to petitioner's expressions of nonrevolutionary opinion on everyday political topics; it is these topics with which its publications and broadcasts deal. The label and announcement thus imposed by governmental edict, are intended to and would cause petitioner's literature and broadcasts to be shunned, on the basis of their source and regardless of their content, and thus contrary to First Amendment principle.

E. Besides impinging on First Amendment rights by imposition of a public stigma that particularly affects peaceable political expression and association, the registration order also restrains freedom of expression by reason of the basis on which it was made. For "one of the chief items of evidence in the case," according to the Court below (R. 2148), was the evidence of petitioner's expression of non-violent non-revolutionary opinions on international issues that were similar to opinions expressed by Soviet Russia. The source of the similarity of views was held irrelevant, or even whether the petitioner's views were adopted before or after adoption of a similar view by Russia.

Imposition of the stigma and penalties of the Act in large part on the basis of a mere coincidence of views on current political questions with those of Soviet Russia, would clearly tend to influence all organizations in this country to limit their expression of views that do or might coincide with Russia's. Furthermore, independent, individual expression on current international questions would be similarly restrained, for, as a result of this order and the definition of membership, expression of views akin to those of Russia would subject an individual to the risk of being held a member of petitioner. Many of these views are not uniquely the product of Communism, and might be regarded as meritorious on non-Communist premises. Thus, by indicating that views coinciding with Russia's are forbidden territory, this order tends to seriously impede the free expression and free scrutiny of ideas by non-Communists with respect to crucial international issues.

F. In its effect on freedom of political expression, the instant registration requirement is markedly dissimilar from all previous registration statutes. Thus, the foreign agent's registration statute applies to representatives of friendly and esteemed governments no less than the hostile or disfavored, and the lobbyists' registration is required of the most respected groups along with the less reputable. Any stigma attaching to the registrant would arise from the circumstances, not from deliberate Governmental selection and designation. And any reflection attaching to a registrant under those acts could hardly compare with the odium arising from the instant order, for the very reason that those registration systems did not include a procedure for findings by which the Government would deliberately set about creating a stigma. The purpose and effect of registration as a "Communist-action organization" or its member, and thus as an organization or person treacherously destroying our government, is virtually to close the marketplace of opinion to expressions by the organization and its members; on the other hand, the effect of registration as a lobbyist or foreign agent is, in general, to leave unimpaired the communication of their opinions, and merely circulate in addition information as to the source of the opinions to aid in their evaluation.

G. The purported justification for the restraints imposed by the registration requirement on non-revolutionary political expression and association appears to be that through such peaceful expression and association petitioner may lead people to engage in subversive acts of violence against the Government, sabotage, or espionage. Thus, this measure does not restrain incitement to violence, nor is it even advocacy of violence that is being restrained. Rather, it cuts off expression and association that merely may lead to endorsement of violence which in turn may lead to action—an area of expression so far back in the continuity leading to the possibility of violence that it has heretofore been given absolute protection. This Act takes the unprecedented position that the total right to political expression and association can be controlled and crippled merely because one phase of a persons's or organization's activity is found to be dangerous.

Such an unprecedented reaching-back into the area of peaceable expression and association would be permissible only if the Goverment could show a danger of violence, espionage or sabotage so great and threatening that ordinary measures could not be trusted and usual respect for First Amendment rights could not be accorded. No such threat has been shown; nor has there been any demonstration that narrower and more direct means, operating nearer the point of danger are inadequate.

The lower court's view that the order might be justified as a means of averting the danger of foreign control or foreign interference with our governmental processes, entirely ignores the extent of petitioner's political strength and influence, which is so insubstantial as to make this danger chimerical.

H. The constitutional infirmity of the registration order under the First Amendment inheres in the statutory provision under which the order was issued, and renders the provision for the registration of "Communist-action organizations" and all the statutory provisions dependent thereon invalid.

ARGUMENT

The registration order against petitioner, and the statutory provision for registration as here interpreted, violate the First Amendment to the Constitution.

A. The purpose and effect of the registration order is to impose a restraint on the First Amendment rights of petitioner and its members to engage in peaceful expression of non-revolutionary opinions and in association for the purpose of such expression.

1. The Peaceful Non-violent Phase of Petitioner's Activity.

To understand the purpose and effect of the registration provision, it is necessary to have in mind one of the basic facts Congress had in contemplation in enacting it: that the Communist Party's contact with the public is as a political organization expressing non-revolutionary and non-violent opinions on the issues of the day. While force and violence has been judicially found to be its covert and ultimate pattern, this aspect of its program does not enter into the views it presents to the public when it supports candidates for election, takes a position on legislation, holds public meetings, circulates petitions or engages in other of its propaganda activities. Indeed, the actual extent to which a belief in overthrow of the government by force and violence has taken hold even in the convictions of the rank-and-file of the membership has not been established by the Report of the Subversive Activities Control Board here in issue, or otherwise. Cf. Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, 526-528.

That the Party acts in its public appearances "as a political organization" is a matter of common knowledge, recognized in the decisions of this Court (American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 404). As Mr. Justice Jackson said in a more detailed analysis: "(T)hose Communist Party activities visible to the public closely resemble those of any other party * * *. There are, however, contradictions between what meets the eye and what is covertly done * * *" (ibid, at p. 423; Jackson, J. concurring and dissenting, each in part).[2]

Regardless of what is being covertly done, it appears that the last years in which the Communist Party in this country made any open or direct declaration relative to force, violence, or overthrow of the government was 1934 or 1935 (Court of Appeals Opinion, R. 2140-2141). Instead, its public expressions relate to the various social and political issues of the day, such as labor relations, race discrimination, and most notably and most emphasized by the Court below, international affairs, such as relations with China, war in Korea, or control of atomic weapons (R. 2145-2146; see SACB Report, R. 82-84).

2. Purpose and Effect of Registration in Relation to First Amendment Rights.

It is clear from the Congressional reports and debates on this Act, and we do not believe it can be controverted, that the primary purpose of the registration provision was to curtail and restrict the effectiveness of petitioner and its members when they seek to express themselves on these everyday non-revolutionary political issues, and attempt to associate for the purpose of such expression. No previous legislation had been so designed; previously only harmful acts or advocacy of forceful overthrow of the government had been restrained. See Douds, 339 U. S. at p. 404; and Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 502, where

[2] The Party's public role as an organ for the expression of non-violent political opinion has been recognized over a period of years. See Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, 157; Ex parte Fierstein, 41 F. 2d 53 (C. A. 9th, 1930); Strecker v. Kessler, 95 F. 2d 976 (C. A. 5th, 1938), aff'd on other grounds, 307 U. S. 22; Ward, Communist Party and The Ballot, 1 (1941) Bill of Rights Review (publication of the American Bar Association), 286; Note, 52 (1942) Yale Law Journal 108, 128. this Court pointed out that in the legislation there in issue "Congress did not intend to eradicate the free discussion of political theories, to destroy the traditional rights of Americans to discuss and evaluate ideas without fear of governmental sanction".

(a) Legislative History

The Senate Report on the bill which became the instant Act pointed out: "The purpose of registration is— (a) to expose the Communist movement and protect the public against innocent and unwitting collaboration with it * * *",[3] and "The proposed bill represents * * * a registration statute calculated to effect disclosure of the identity and propaganda of individual Communists and Communist organizations."[4] Besides making clear that the registration requirement was designed primarily for its effect on the public and on Communist propaganda, the Report also makes clear that the propaganda the draftsman had in mind was those opinions on everyday political issues on which the Party customarily addressed the public. For the Report points out, in justification for the Act's purpose of exposure, that "the present line of the Party * * * is to avoid wherever possible the open advocacy of violence"[5] Illustrating the intended effect of registration on the public and its purpose of impeding the expression of non-revolutionary political opinion and peaceful political association by Communists, Senator Ferguson, who submitted the Senate Report, pointed out on the floor that genuine liberals should appreciate the registration provision because it would help them prevent Communist infiltration of their organizations.[6]

The Report then specifies the acts made unlawful by the statute, such as the communication of defense secrets.

(b) Effect of Registration.

That the major purpose of the registration provision is to impede peaceable association and exchange of opinion by and with Communists, is indeed evident from the nature of the requirement. Though section 2 of the Act speaks of secret acts of espionage and sabotage as characteristic of the world Communist movement, this Government's informing the public that the Communist Party is a "Communist-action organization" as defined in the Act, and of the identity of its officers, members, and contributors, is obviously not calculated to prevent these surreptitious criminal acts. Nor is such public exposure and opprobrious designation intended for the use of government officials in denying Communists employment or subjecting them to other restraints,[7] nor will it help the FBI in surveillance of those members or helpers who are engaged in covert and dangerous activity.

[6] 96 Cong. Rec. 14535. See also Senator Ferguson's statement that the purpose of registration is "to protect the public at large against innocent collaboration with communism and against its treachery * * *. No longer can there be dupes"; and his repeated explanations that the purpose was disclosure to the public (Ibid. and 96 Cong. Rec. 14439-14440). See statement of Senator Mundt, another draftsman of the Act (see 96 Cong. Rec. 14575) and the Act "will alert Americans to the fact that Communist propaganda is spewed out to them from Communist sources" (96 Cong. Rec. 14598) and that the American people will be "alerted" to the danger from Communists by the Act itself, even before issuance of a SACB order: 96 Cong. Rec. 14497. See also statement of Senator Holland, one of the active proponents of the Act, as to the purpose of exposing the identity of Communists to the public: 96 Cong. Rec. 14491-14492.

[7] It is evident that the registration is in no way essential for the operation of the other sections of the Act; indeed, as petitioner has pointed out and as was pointed out in the Presidential veto, the limitations imposed on the Party with respect to tax exemption, and its members with respect to employment, etc., by the other sections of the Act, were already in effect before its passage.

The major effect of the registration device would be the intended effect: imposing a restraint on peaceable expression on everyday political topics by petitioner and its members, and on peaceable association for such expression. Indeed, stigmatization of petitioner as a "Communist-action organization" and of its members would tend to exclusively affect this area of expression and association. For persons in sympathy with violent overthrow of the government or overtly pro-Soviet aims would hardly be influenced against the Party or its members by the "Communist-action" designation; people who would be influenced by the Government stamp of treason on the organization and its members would tend to be those who would in its absence be attracted or influenced by the Communists' expressions of opinion on everyday political topics.

The rights of peaceable expression and association would suffer the impact of the Governmentally-imposed stigma from a number of directions. The petitioner's right to gain adherents for the expression of political opinions, and of those who are members to have likeminded persons join with them for such expression, would obviously be affected by the fact that the members as well as the organization would be subjected to the stigmatizing registration; and conversely, this penalty on membership would curtail and restrain the freedom of any persons to associate in the Communist Party and through it to express themselves on the numerous political issues with which the Party deals.[8] Again, the stigma affects the right of the Communist Party and its members to address the public on such political issues, by deterring and discouraging people from giving them an audience or responding to their views; and conversely it curtails the freedom of non-members to hear and [8] Once it is established that the First Amendment rights of one of the parties before the Court are affected, it is appropriate for this Court to consider the full effect of the Act in appraising whether it it a reasonable limitation on First Amendment freedom. See, i.e., Bridges v. California, 314 U. S. 252, 268; Schneider v. State, 308 U. S. 147, 161.

consider petitioner's and its members' views, through fear of associating with or responding to Government-stigmatized persons and thus likewise themselves running the danger of Government disapprobation. The restraint bears down on a crucial aspect of First Amendment rights when it interferes with the public's willingness to hear and consider the views of petitioner and its members; for "the right of free speech is guaranteed every citizen that he may reach the minds of willing listeners."[9] Here the "channels of communication"[10] are blocked off by a weapon perhaps as effective as physical interference.

It may be granted that the registration order will to some extent affect the functioning of the Party and its members in all respects. However, considering that the effect of registration on everyday peaceful political expression and association is not incidental or accidental, but rather a major legislative purpose; that the direct and immediate and most pronounced impact of registration will be in that sphere; and the established doctrine that particularly in a measure affecting First Amendment rights its entire reach must be considered in determining its constitutionality,[11] — for all these reasons, the registration requirement must be tested for constitutionality as a measure affecting the rights of peaceful political expression and association.

In that the effect of the registration provision is to limit the audience for the views of petitioner and its members, the restraint is similar in operation to the more conventional type of restriction heretofore imposed on free expression. See, i.e., Saia, where the interference with the right of free speech took the form of limiting the audience through limiting the use of loudspeakers; Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U. S. 268; Kunz v. New York, 340 U. S. 290: limiting the possibility of an audience by limiting the place of meeting.

3. Doctrinal Recognition that Stigma Imposed by Registration Order is Restraint of First Amendment Rights.

While the Court of Appeals was willing to assume the registration requirement imposed a restraint on First Amendment rights (R. 2088), it then failed to appreciate its true significance (R. 2109-2110). The registration provision here in issue is far from a mere requirement for information or an accounting. Rather, it is a deliberate and intentional use of what appears to be a new governmental weapon, new at least in the United States: Governmental imposition of a public stigma. And certainly the stigma provided by the Act—of involvement in treachery, violence, destruction of all liberty—is a most odious one, undeniably effective to accomplish the intended restraints on peacable expression and association.

This Court has already realistically recognized the legal injury the Government inflicts by imposing a stigma such as here in issue, for its effect is "to cripple the functioning" of the affected organization.[12] Governmental condemnation is a signal for public scorn and an implicit indication of Governmental approval of whatever penalties the public chooses to inflict through private power; and it carries with it a shadowy threat of other possible sanctions by the condemning and puissant Government. The fact that in stigmatizing, the Government causes the injury through a reaction to its act on the part of third persons—that is, through the public's response—does not lessen the Government's responsibility for the injury, or free it from the necessity for compliance with constitutional standards.[13]

Nor does the fact that the designation might be true make it any the less an interference with First Amendment rights. See this Court's opinion in Rumely v. United States, 345 U. S. 41, 44, 48, recognizing implicitly that an exposure by a Congressional committee, though truthful, affects First Amendment rights. The Court of Appeals' Rumely decision had spelled out the nature of the interference with First Amendment rights, pointing out that "to publicize or report to the Congress the names of purchasers" of Rumely's literature would have curtailed purchases, because the "realistic effect of public embarrassment is a powerful interference with the free expression of views." 197 F. 2d 166, 174 (C. A. D. C.)[14] The armband worn by government command in Hitler Germany was no less an injury because persons forced to wear it were in fact Jewish, and had theretofore been known as such. As this Court said in Douds:

> "Under some circumstances, indirect 'discouragements' undoubtedly have the same coercive effect upon the exercise of First Amendment rights as imprisonment, fines, injunctions or taxes. A requirement that adherents of particular religious faiths or political parties wear identifying armbands, for example, is obviously of this nature" (339 U. S. at p. 402).

It would seem a monstrous constitutional doctrine that the Government could impose a stigma, deliberately for the purpose of, and with the clear effect of, interfering with First Amendment rights, without compliance with the First Amendment, and the decisions of this Court do not permit such a result.[15]

B. The restraint imposed on peaceful expression and association by the registration order violates the First Amendment doctrine enunciated in this Court's De Jonge decision.

The preceding discussion has shown that the First Amendment right to free association, so important to effectuate the right of expression on political issues,[16] and the right of expression itself, are curtailed and restrained by the Governmental stigmatization of petitioner and its members through the registration requirement. We have further shown that this restraint affects all exercises of the rights of expression and association by petitioner and its members and that it was intended to, and does, especially affect non-revolutionary expression on everyday political issues, and association for the purpose of such expression.

[15] It is to be noted that a requirement to register in order to exercise First Amendment rights is, even without the imposition of a stigma, a prior restraint upon, and an interference with First Amendment rights. See Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516; compare Schneider v. State, 308 U. S. 147, 164; Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U. S. 105, 122 (dissenting opinion); Electric Bond and Share Co. v. S.E.C., 303 U. S. 419, 441; see also United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 625-626. Though here the registration requirement was not explicitly imposed on the right to make a speech or distribute literature, it was imposed on an organization whose chief public function lay in this field, and for the purpose of affecting this function.

See pp. 33-34, infra, as to the complete inappositeness here of the Harriss holding that the registration provision there at issue, though affecting First Amendment rights, was constitutional.

[16] The right to join organizations is part of the right to assembly protected by the First Amendment. See Douds, at p. 400; see also Garner v. Los Angeles Board, 341 U. S. 716, 728 (Frankfurter, J. concurring in part). And the right to freedom of assembly is "cognate" to, and "inseparable" from the right to free expression. De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353, 364; Thomas v. Collins, 325 U. S. 516, 530-531.

For the Government to so burden the freedom to associate and express opinions, though the opinions do not in themselves create a danger, is a direct contradiction of the fundamental First Amendment principle expressed in DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353, 362:

> "The question, if the rights of free speech and peaceable assembly are to be preserved, is not as to the auspices under which the meeting is held but as to its purpose; not as to the relations of the speakers, but whether their utterances transcend the bounds of the freedom of speech which the Constitution protects." [17]

Thus, this Court's unanimous opinion by Chief Justice Hughes emphasized that the salient consideration in the exchange of opinion and in the Government's power to restrict it, is what is said, not who says it. Restraint of speech must be based on its content rather than its source, on the character of the idea, rather than the speaker. In direct contradiction, the rationale of the registration provision at bar is to diminish the right of expression and association of a Communist regardless of his subject, and in particular to negate his freedom of expression through discouraging consideration or even a hearing of his opinions.

This subversion of the DeJonge doctrine has large significance, because it means a rejection of our basic tenet that truth can be sifted from error by the "power of reason as applied through public discussion." [18] "(T)he basis of the First Amendment is the hypothesis that speech can rebut speech, propaganda will answer propaganda, free debate of ideas will result in the wisest governmental policy."[19] This Act expresses no confidence in the free exchange and free scrutiny of ideas as the way to truth. On the contrary, the draftsmen here assumed that exposure to error is likely to be fatal to the discovery of truth; they assumed that the "power of reason" was not sufficient to determine the merit of ideas, and that the American public cannot, without Government identification of the false prophets, determine whether ideas are false or true. This Act assigns to the Government, not to the individual's power of reason, the function of protecting the people from being misled.

[17] The holding was that DeJonge could not constitutionally be held guilty of a crime merely because he assisted (through making a speech) at a meeting held under the auspices of the Communist Party. The question of whether criminal syndicalism had been advocated at the meeting had been ruled to be outside the issues of the case by the state courts. In speaking of the relevance of the "purpose" of the meeting, the Court was not referring to its possible hidden purpose, but to the content of the particular meeting: whether it involved the advocacy of syndicalism, or merely of peaceful political methods.

Recent experience has shown the prescience of this Court in emphasizing the indispensability of the DeJonge doctrine for the preservation of free exchange of opinion. Thus, the focus by Congressional investigating committees on the sole question of whether the person expressing an idea is or was a Communist, has lead to abandonment of evaluation of the merit of ideas and instead to considering only whether they are evidence of Communist sympathy.[20] There is a consequent fear, recognized even by our more conservative observers,[21] to express or respond to any idea, regardless of its merits, that may be regarded as evidence of Communist sympathy. Only "100% Americanism" seems safe. For, when the Government assumes the new role of telling the citizenry whom to distrust, as it does by the instant registration provision, it undermines the citizen's self-reliance and intellectual courage to determine whom he should trust as well. As in the establishment of any system of censorship, there is a "pervasive" effect upon the whole institution of free thought, and independent individual determination of whom and what is to be credited or discredited.[22]

Thus, as indicated in DeJonge, the Government can, without ostensibly condemning one set of ideas and approving another, accomplish this same constitutionally forbidden result by merely condemning and stigmatizing the proponents of a disapproved viewpoint. By restraining expression on the basis of who rather than what, the Government extends its power to repress past its Constitutionally permissible scope, and can effectually restrain the expression of views other than those that "transcend" Constitutional limits (see DeJonge quotation, supra).

Certainly, knowledge of whether a person is a Communist, or of his various motivations, biases, and preconceptions may be valuable in appraising the validity of his ideas, and the benefit of associating with him. But in a democracy, the function of obtaining or using this knowl-

The pervasive effect of the registration requirement was indicated by Seth W. Richardson, first chairman of the SACB. In praise of the Act, he said that as a result of its passage and even before the Board issued any orders, he thought "individuals will have a tendency to shy away from joining organizations that might be subversive for fear of having to own up to such affiliations by signing the Justice Department register." U. S. News and World Report for November 3, 1950, p. 33 (italics added).

edge cannot be transferred from the hands of the citizen to the Government. As Mr. Justice Jackson said in a succinct statement of democratic faith: "It is not the function of our Government to keep the citizen from falling into error."[23] Absent circumstances of extraordinary danger, which we shall show do not here exist (infra, pp. 36-40), the citizen is to rely upon the exercise of his own reason and the exchange and clash of ideas in the marketplace, for his protection against the false and misleading. The Government cannot take on the function of directing him in the realm of ideas and associations; it cannot impede peacable expression and association on the basis of its source by imposition of a stigma, as was here attempted.

Denial of tax exemption to the petitioner and of deductibility for income tax purposes of contributions to it; prohibition of Government or defense facility employment or the issuance of a passport for a member; and special provisions with respect to alien members, also come into play as a direct result of the registration order (§§ 11, 5, 6, 22-25; see Court of Appeals' Opinion, R. 2083, 2109). These provisions involve other constitutional doctrines and factual considerations in addition to those of concern in this brief. However, from the perspective of the First Amendment and as attachments to the registration requirement which has the primary purpose and effect of interfering with peaceful political expression and association by and through the Communist Party (supra, pp. 14-18), these provisions must be viewed as increasing the interference with First Amendment rights effected through the stigma of registration as a "Communist-action organization". These ancillary provisions help cripple the organization in all its operations, including and in particular its public peaceful political phase; set up powerful deterrents to membership for any purpose, including the purpose of peaceful political expression; and discourage any contact with the organization or its views, including those on everyday political questions, because the drastic penalties on membership would cause people to avoid any possibility of suspicion of membership.

C. The requirement of Section 10 for the labeling of publications and broadcasts also restrains freedom of expression in a manner contrary to the DeJonge doctrine.

Under § 10 of the Act a direct and immediate consequence of the registration order is that petitioner must label all publications and their wrappers as well as precede all radio or television broadcasts with the notice that they are "disseminated" or "sponsored by ....., a Communist organization." Like the registration requirement itself, the purpose and effect of this provision is to restrict the petitioner's right, and the right of petitioner's members through the organization, to address the public on the political issues which, as we have pointed out, are the customary subjects of its public expressions. Again, as by the registration requirement itself, the Government is interfering with the right of petitioner and its members to an audience on non-revolutionary political topics through the technique of attaching a public stigma to their expressions of opinion. For, the label and announcement required by section 10 reflect and epitomize the findings of the SACB as to the opprobrious character of the organization and its connection with the world Communist movement, described in highly condemnatory terms in section 2 of the Act.

To reinforce the purpose that the literature and broadcasts not only should be discredited but should be completely shunned, the wrapper of the publication is to bear the opprobrious label and the announcement is to precede the broadcast. This device would tend to produce returns of the mail unopened, in an attempt—perhaps futile—to avoid the contagion of the stigma.[24]

The labeling and announcement requirement is a graphic effectuation of the rationale of the registration provision itself: that the Government should avert and prevent the people's exposure, or at the very least response, to what the Government has determined is likely to be misleading in the realm of political ideas. Section 10 is again a flagrant contradiction of the DeJonge principle that the right to express opinions freely—necessarily including the right to wage an independent fight in the marketplace for an audience—can be restricted, so far as the Government is concerned, only on the basis of what is said and not on the basis of who says it. We have already discussed the general importance of the DeJonge principle to the preservation of free exchange and free scrutiny of ideas. And it is apparent that the particular effect of the stigmatizing device provided in Section 10 would be that the opinions expressed in labeled literature or broadcasts would take on the stigma of the organization, with the result that non-Communists would not feel free to express those or similar opinions, nor would these Governmentally stigmatized ideas be evaluated on their merits by the public, regardless of who expressed them. When it is borne in mind that many of the views expressed by the Communist Party on current issues could honestly commend themselves to non-Communists on entirely different basic premises from those motivating the Communists, it is apparent that the restraint resulting from Section 10 on the freedom of non-Communists to express and consider ideas would cover broad areas of political thought.

[24] Thus, the labeling requirement not only operates as, but resembles in form, a prior restraint on expression. Cf. Donaldson v. Read, 333 U. S. 278.

It is apparent that the instant requirement of an opprobrious identification, deliberately required before the communication of opinion, is different in its effect on free expression from a general system for simple factual identification of authors or sponsors. See further comparison of instant measure with other types of registration and identification measures, infra, pp. 31-33.

D. The registration order, with the resulting stigma, deprivations, and penalties, was based largely on the expression of non-revolutionary political opinions, and restrains the expression of such opinions.

"One of the chief items of evidence in the case", according to the Court of Appeals (R. 2148), establishing that petitioner is a "Communist-action organization", is the evidence on which the Board relied under § 13(e)(2) respecting "the extent to which its [petitioner's] views and policies do not deviate from those of such foreign government [the Soviet Union] * * *." This evidence, which was according to the Court's own statement a major cause for the imposition of the stigma and penalties of the Act, consisted of the Party's non-revolutionary political opinions on the issues of the day. Thus, the Court catalogued as important subjects on which the Party had expressed its views "the Truman doctrine; the Marshall Plan, ECA, the North Atlantic Pact, control and inspection of atomic energy, the seating of Yugoslavia in the United Nations Security Council, the representation of China in the United Nations, the peace treaty with Japan, the William Oatis case, and the Korean War" (R. 2145). The Court also cited the Party's changing views as to World War II and the post-war Eastern European governments; "the blockade of Berlin in 1948"; and "of current significance" its views on Korea including the view "that the Syngman Rhee government is a reactionary 'puppet regime'" (R. 2146).

Not only were political viewpoints thus treated as a basis for imposition of penalties, but, of great significance to free expression, the Board and in turn the Court held that under § 13 they were to consider, and in fact did consider as a "chief" item of evidence, mere coincidence of petitioner's views on these political issues with those of the Soviet Union. It was not necessary, they held, to consider the origin of each position, with respect to who proposed it or how it was adopted; indeed, it was not deemed relevant under the statute even whether the cited views of the Party were adopted before or after their endorsement by the Soviet Union (SACB Report, R. 81-86;[25] Court's Opinion, R. 2146). Finally, the Court held any degree of coincidence of views with the Soviet Union can be given weight under the statute (R. 2122).

The fact that any degree of coincidence of views with Russia's can be treated as significant is apparent on the face of the statute; but this wide-open criterion assumes major importance from the standpoint of free expression because of the interpretation herein that mere coincidence of views with the Soviet Union is the factor to which the statute refers. Even if this were a statute requiring a showing that each coincidence of view originated in Russian policy, expression of coinciding views by non-Communists as well as Communists would be restrained; because of the natural apprehension that the subtle question of motive might be mistakenly appraised.[26] But the instant Act as here interpreted and applied is much more blatant; there are no subtleties here. Coincidence of view, without any regard to origin or even chronology, and even though incomplete and partial, can be a major factor in evoking the stigma and penalties of the Act.

Not only is mere coincidence of views with Russia's treated as "one of the chief items of evidence" in upholding the instant order. Further, the Party's non-revolutionary views on international questions are highlighted in the total picture of petitioner's current program. For this aspect of its activities was established by direct evidence, rather than depending in any part on inference from the past or from general concepts and relations, and it relates to immediate rather than ultimate aims (see Court of Appeals' Opinion, indicating the degree of inference involved in other items of proof, and the ultimate character of other goals, R. 2138-2143, 2147, 2148-2152). Thus, in any organization's practical consideration of how to conduct its current operations in order to avert the stigma and penalties of the Act, it would necessarily regard avoidance of expression of views similar to Russia's as highly important.

[25] The SACB Report in some instances mentions that Russia's view on an issue was adopted prior to the Party's similar view, but on many issues gives no consideration to this question.

[26] Douds, 339 U. S. at p. 437 (Jackson, J., concurring and dissenting, each in part).

Besides limiting freedom of expression by organizations, and by individuals through their organizations, equally or more the instant order also discourages independent individual expression of views similar to those that are or may be voiced by Russia, no matter how honestly held. For under the Act a person's support of any of petitioner's viewpoints is evidence of his membership in petitioner;[27] and with the emphasis in the instant case on petitioner's views on international questions, and on the mere coincidence thereof with Russia's, the potential importance of this type of opinion in the determination of membership is augmented. Thus, to avoid the serious deprivations and penalties the Act imposes on members, individuals would be under a constraint to forego expression of views similar to petitioner's or Russia's on all international issues.

[27] Section 5 of the Communist Control Act of 1954 (68 Stat. 775, 50 U. S. C. 481) provides in part: "In determining membership or participation in the Communist Party * * * the jury * * * shall consider evidence * * * as to whether the accused person * * * (11) Has advised, counseled or in any other way imparted information, suggestions, recommendations to * * * anyone * * * in behalf of the objectives of the organization; (12) Has indicated by word * * * writing or in any other way a willingness to carry out in any manner and to any degree the plans, designs, objectives, or purposes of the organization; (13) Has in any other way participated in the * * * objectives or purposes of the organization * * *."

These criteria of membership are applicable in prosecutions under § 15(c) of the instant Act, which provides for a maximum of a $10,000 fine and imprisonment for not more than 5 years for individuals violating §§ 5, 6, or 10. No administrative finding or order that an individual is a member is prerequisite as a preliminary to such a prosecution. See Court of Appeals' discussion of procedure for imposition of sanctions and penalties on members, R. 2106-2107, particularly note 48.

The instant Act, as here interpreted, is the first legislative enactment in which coincidence of views on international questions with Russia's has been made a basis for stigma, penalty, and deprivation. Many of these views—on Korea, atomic control, war—are not uniquely the product of Communism, and might be regarded as meritorious on non-Communist premises. Thus, it is impossible to treat views coinciding with Russia's as forbidden territory, and still maintain for non-Communists a free examination of ideas. The restraint extended by this Act therefore impedes the ascertainment of truth on the crucial international issues of our time. As Zechariah Chafee pointed out, these crucial issues "cannot be wisely decided unless individuals and opinion-forming organizations on one side are left as free to present their views as those on the other side." [28]

In operating as a restraint on the expression of views that are similar to those that are or might be expressed by the Soviet Union, the instant order obliterates "the First Amendment's command that the opportunities for free public discussion be maintained." Douds, at p. 400.

E. The instant registration requirement is, from the standpoint of free expression, wholly distinguishable from registration devices heretofore used.

The Court of Appeals, paying scant attention to the unique characteristics of the instant registration requirement, noted that registration was also required of "lobbyists * and foreign agents, and even of doctors, lawyers, restaurants and barbers, who are required to register and obtain licenses" (R. 2109-2110). While the latter occupational registration and licensing requirements are wholly dissimilar in rationale and effect from the instant one, we recognize that the required registrations of lobbyists and foreign agents are to some degree analogous in that they too relate to the communication of opinion. Amicus submits, however, that those measures do not restrain free expression to any extent comparable with the instant registration; indeed, amicus has not opposed the statutes requiring registration of lobbyists and foreign agents.

The great distinction between all previous registration requirements and the instant one lies in the fact that under this Act the Government stamps particular groups and persons with such a mark of opprobrium, odium, and danger to the State, that opinion emanating from them would be universally despised and shunned. Under the lobbyists' and foreign agents' acts, on the other hand, representatives of the most reputable groups and most esteemed foreign powers must register along with those of the ill-reputed. It is true that if the disclosure required by these acts would identify the registrant in an unpopular role, he might refrain from his intended propaganda activities in order to avoid registration; or if he did register, the disclosure might greatly diminish the influence of his expressions of opinion on some of the public. But the stigma, if any, would arise from the circumstances, not from deliberate Governmental selection and designation. And the odium attaching to a registrant under those acts could hardly compare with that arising from the instant order, for the very reason that those registration systems did not include a procedure for findings by which the Government would deliberately set about creating a stigma. One need only compare the fear and complete rejection that would be likely to greet receipt in the mail of a publication displaying that it was "disseminated by the Communist Party, a Communist organization", with the response under ordinary circumstances to mail that merely showed it was sent by a person registered as an agent of a foreign government.

It is the governmentally-imposed stigma, not registration as such, which is the root of the violation of the First Amendment in the instant case. It is through the stigma, not through registration as such, that the instant registration requirement throws a restraint over freedom of expression and contradicts the DeJonge doctrine that there must be a free circulation of ideas regardless of source, so long as they do not transcend Constitutional limits. The effect of registration as a lobbyist or foreign agent is, in general, to leave the communication of their opinions unimpaired, and merely add a knowledge of the source of the opinions to aid in their evaluation. The instant act, however, stands for the proposition that the Government can, by fastening a severely maiming and ostracising stigma on a group of persons engaged in political propaganda, effectively close the market place of opinion to the expression of their views.

From the standpoint of the effect on free expression, it is also important that none of the previous registration requirements were imposed on the basis of, and thereby restrained, the expression of political viewpoints, which was a major basis of the instant order (supra, pp. 28-31).[29]

The lobbyist registration act is also significantly distinguishable from the instant one on the very basis on which this Court upheld it in Harriss. That Act, this Court held, was directed to a legitimate concern of Congressmen in their representative function: determination of whether appeals addressed to them reflect actual public sentiment or are artificially stimulated (347 U. S. at p. 625). Thus, the lobbyist registration is addressed to informing a limited group, Congressmen, in a special situation where it is consistent with the First Amendment for the Government to [29] Thus, those who are required to register under the lobbying act are defined in specific and objective terms as those who "solicited, collected, or received" contributions, with a major purpose of influencing legislation, "through direct communication with members of Congress." United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 623.

concern itself with the source of opinion rather than merely its content.[30]

The registrations required by such statutes as those administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission are again in a class apart, somewhat like the registration of restaurants and barbers cited by the Court of Appeals. Those disclosures relate to the sale of commodities; they do not affect trade in political ideas. Labeling under those statutes is analogous to that under the Pure Food and Drug Act, but the Government is here asserting the power to attach invidious labels in the field of political expression.

F. The restraints imposed on First Amendment freedoms by the registration order are not constitutionally justified as a means of averting danger to the state.

We have demonstrated the extensive restraint the registration order imposes on the expression of everyday non-revolutionary political opinions, and on association for the purpose of such expression through (1) the stigma the order spreads over all expression or association by the Communist Party and its members (supra, pp. 15-21); (2) the specific deprivations imposed on Party members as a consequence of the order, which increase the cost of expression through, or association with, the Party (supra, pp. 25-26); (3) the particular stigma imposed on the Party's broadcasts and publications, notwithstanding their non-violent political content (supra, pp. 26-28); and (4) issuance of the order in large part on the basis of the Party's expression of non-revolutionary political opinions similar to those expressed by Russia (supra, pp. 28-30). We have also demonstrated that the restraint imposed by the [30] Neither this Court nor the Courts of Appeals had occasion to consider the constitutionality of the foreign agents' registration act. In Viereck v. United States, 318 U. S. 236, the agent had registered and the Court only considered what the statute intended the registration statement to cover. This Court held that the act only applied to propaganda the agent was shown to have put out directly on behalf of his foreign principal, rather than all the propaganda he disseminated.

registration requirement on the First Amendment rights of peaceful expression and association was deliberate and purposeful, and that its repercussions extend far beyond the petitioner, its members, and those who might want to become associated with petitioner. For, in addition to its effect on these groups, this unprecedented attack on expression and association, based on its source rather than its content, tends to change the whole perspective of the American people towards the free exchange of opinion.

It is apparent that the purported justification for this unprecedented restraint on peaceful expression and association requires close judicial scrutiny. To restrain innocent expression as part of an attack on culpable, has never been countenanced under the First Amendment; a ban on expression must be limited to the dangerous matter. See Donaldson v. Read, 333 U. S. 178.[31] Even outside the pivotal First Amendment area, the Government cannot restrain the innocent along with the dangerous, except in time of extreme national emergency when the peril is great and is so imminent that it is reasonable to think there is no feasible alternative method of averting it. See and compare Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81; Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214; and Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283.

Thus, we submit that the serious import of the instant order cannot be exaggerated. Its validation would create an entirely new precedent drastically diminishing the security of our Constitutional right to peaceful political expression and organization. If the total right could be suppressed merely because one phase of a person's or organization's activity was found to be dangerous, there would be an elastic, easily available, and generally applicable weapon for cutting off the political expression and association which is the most significant aspect of the First Amendment.[32] And besides its repugnance to First Amendment principles, this Act's treatment of petitioner and its members as evil for all purposes, strikes one as repugnant to the general philosophy we are trying to preserve. For, stamping any group of people as pariahs, hemming in their freedom in all their expressions and activities, violates the fundamental pattern of a government of toleration, of restricted rather than totalitarian power, that enacts only those restrictions necessary to deal with perceptible dangers, and otherwise respects the rights of all within its jurisdiction.

What is the danger which is alleged to warrant an Act and order so contradictory of our basic principles of Government?

1. Relation of order to danger of Government's overthrow, espionage or sabotage.

Section 2 of the Act, stating the "necessity for legislation," states the danger as the establishment of "a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world * * * by * * * the overthrow of existing governments" (§ 2(1), (6)). The legislative declaration conceives, correctly, of overthrow as the antithesis of peaceful persuasion, referring to the fact that the world Communist movement promotes the objective of overthrow "by conspiratorial and coercive tactics, instead of through the democratic processes of a free elective system * * *" (2(6)). Section 2 also refers to the danger of "clever and ruthless espionage and sabotage tactics" (2(11)). The [32] Freedom of political expression and association is synonymous with our very form of government and is the most vital aspect of First Amendment freedom: Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507, 517, 518; Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359, 369.

Court of Appeals, in upholding the Act and the order, conceived of the major justifying danger as an effort to overthrow the Government (R. 2121). What is the relation between these dangers and the restraint imposed by the registration provision which was intended to affect, and does primarily affect the right of expression and association for peaceful political purposes in and with the Communist Party and the rights of Communists to express themselves on ordinary social and political questions? How does the purported danger of overthrow, sabotage, or espionage necessitate the restraint of expression on issues unrelated to dictatorship, overthrow, sabotage or espionage? How is the petitioner's use of the normal "democratic processes" referred to approvingly in the Act, a danger?

It is apparent that the purported Congressional justification for restraining peaceful expression and association as a means of preventing overthrow, sabotage, and espionage, is the possibility that through such expression and association for peaceful political purposes the Party will lead people eventually to engage in these subversive acts. Thus, this measure does not restrain incitement to violence, nor is it even advocacy of violence that is being restrained. Rather, this Act restrains expression much further back on the continuity leading to the possibility of violence. It cuts off expression and association that merely may lead to endorsement of violence which in turn may lead to action, —an area of expression so far removed from action that it has heretofore been deemed entitled to absolute protection. See Taylor v. Mississippi, 319 U. S. 583, 589, 590; Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359, 369. Thus, again, the basic rationale of this Act is revealed: its rejection of the value of individual reason and the play of opinion as salutary forces for distinguishing truth from error.[33] Yet it is our constitutional faith that by these forces people can, and for the most part will, protect themselves from being misled into disloyal concepts and activities.[34]

We submit that this unprecedented reaching back into the area of peaceful expression and association, interfering broadly and deeply with First Amendment rights would be permissible only if the Government could show a danger of violence, espionage, or sabotage so great and threatening that ordinary measures could not be trusted and usual respect for First Amendment rights could not be accorded. No such threat has been shown, nor has there been any demonstration that narrower and more direct means, operating nearer the point of danger, are inadequate.[35] Indeed, that more direct means, less injurious to First Amendment principles, are in use is known to this Court. See Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, and pp. 581-582 (Douglas J. dissenting). No need has been shown for cutting down peaceful expression and association for all, in order to meet the threat of violence from a few.

[34] Even in the case of those who are attracted sufficiently by the Party's expression of peaceful political sentiments actually to become Party members, it is clear, not only in theory but in fact that there is no inevitability about their acceptance of disloyalty. It is common knowledge, supplied in the main by many witnesses before Congressional committees in recent years, that persons attracted by the peaceable objectives of the Communist Party frequently broke with it when an attempt was made to lead them to other Party aims. See i.e., testimony of Robert Gorham Davis, Daniel J. Boorstin, and Granville Hicks, Hearings before the House Committee on Un-American Activities (83rd Cong., 1st Sess.) [Communist Methods of Infiltration (Education)], pp. 5, 59, 107-108.

[35] Particularly when a prior restraint on expression is involved, "the state has a heavy burden to demonstrate" that it is justified by "exceptional" circumstances. And in any First Amendment case, it is only a "narrow exception to freedom of expression which a state may carve out to satisfy the adverse demands of other interests of society". Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495, 504. As to the Government's burden to demonstrate the justification for a measure restraining expression and as to the Constitutional requirement that the restraint must be narrowly drawn, see also Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U. S. 77, 88; Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, 530; American Federation of Labor v. Swing, 312 U. S. 321, 325; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 311; Schneider v. State, 308 U. S. 147, 161, 162; United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U. S. 144, 152, n. 4.

This Court's decision in Dennis, cited by the Court of Appeals (R. 2089), does not support the validity of the instant provision and order. There the measure only applied to the advocacy of force and violence; not only was it more directly related to the purported danger, but, in consequence its effect on First Amendment freedoms was far less, nor did it contradict the fundamental First Amendment precept expounded in DeJonge. Still less is the Douds decision, also cited by the Court of Appeals (R. 2091), apposite. There again the measure was a relatively narrow one tailored to directly counter a specific danger of injurious acts.

Thus, assuming the dangers stated in § 2 of the Act exist,[36] and even assuming the voluminous findings of the Board are true, the registration requirement is not a rational and justifiable remedy for these dangers in the light of the First Amendment. The reams of paper that have been filled in making this order and the methodical procedure that has been maintained, are no substitute for appreciation and preservation of the principles of freedom.

2. Danger of Foreign Political Control of Our Government.

Aside from the danger of overthrow of the government, the Court of Appeals also seemed to find justification for the Act in the evil of foreign control or interference in our [36] While we can assume, for the purposes of our argument, the validity of the findings of § 2, we would like to note our disagreement with the view of the Court below on the status of these findings. When this Court indicated in Galvan v. Press that the Congressional findings were valid because they were not "baseless", we submit it did not mean they were valid simply because based on "extensive investigation", as the Court below assumed. (See 347 U. S. 522, 529; opinion of Court below, R. 2132.) Rather we believe this Court meant they were not "baseless" in the sense that they had factual support. And it is to be noted that in Galvan this Court was applying the most minimal standard of judicial review, for it was there considering the validity of a classification of aliens for deportability, with respect to which Congress has an extraordinary measure of discretion. See Galvan, 347 U. S. at pp. 530-531.

government, regardless of the element of violence (R. 2085-2087). Certainly we would not quarrel with the Court's premise that foreign control of our political life is an evil with which Congress may deal. But we most emphatically quarrel with the Court's complete failure to consider how substantial a danger of "foreign control of our governmental affairs" (R. 2086) the petitioner presents.

In Dennis, this Court justified its disregard of the paucity of strength and influence of the Communist Party on the ground that an attempt at overthrow of the government is a danger regardless of the number involved or its certainty of failure, because of the damage the mere attempt could cause (341 U. S. at p. 509). Here, however, where the issue discussed by the Court of Appeals is the exercise of political control by the Party, the extent of its political strength and influence is obviously a most salient consideration.

Particularly in the light of the strong anti-Russian spirit apparent in this country in recent years, it is most difficult to suppose there is any danger petitioner will grow so large, or its views become so influential, that through it the Soviet Union can threaten to control or interfere with "our governmental affairs." And absent such a danger of control or interference, it is contrary to First Amendment fundamentals for this Government to attempt to prevent the expression of political opinion even though it may be formulated because of sympathy for a foreign power. A misleading or evil political influence in itself does not create a danger which is subject to Governmental suppression.

We submit that the now-popular viewpoint [37] that it is the Government's function to deal with any Communist-slanted influence on public opinion is contrary to the First Amendment. As long as the expression of pro-Communist [37] See, i.e., statements of Congressmen during hearings on Bishop Oxnam, cited supra, note 20, indicating that it was appropriate to investigate Communist influence among clergymen though it was recognized to be minimal.

or of any misleading opinion, is of such meager proportions that the free play of opinion can discount and counteract it, it must be left to the battle of the marketplace. It hardly needs our statement that in this principle is the barrier to the State-directed monolithic opinion of a totalitarian state.

G. The statutory provision for registration of "Communist-action organizations" is unconstitutional for similar reasons to those invalidating the order against petitioner.

The arguments we have herein made to show that the registration order issued against petitioner is unconstitutional under the First Amendment, apply either wholly or with slight modification to show the unconstitutionality of the registration provision itself. Our arguments as to the intentional restraint on peaceful expression and association through the imposition of a stigma; the intensification of the restraint by the other deprivations consequent on a registration order; the gravity of the interference with First Amendment rights from the standpoint of the De-Jonge doctrine; and the lack of justification for this restraint and curtailment of First Amendment rights, all go to the unconstitutionality of the statutory provision for registration, as well as the invalidity of the instant order. While conceivably an order could be issued under the instant Act without the great reliance herein put on the expression of peaceful political opinions similar to Russia's, the statutory provision allowing consideration of such opinions, particularly with its interpretation herein, stands as a continuing threat and restraint on the expression of such opinions. Accordingly, the section of our argument dealing with reliance by the SACB and the Court below on mere coincidence of views with Russia's, also substantially applies to the question of statutory validity.

Thus, we submit that the provision for registration of "Communist-action organizations" and all the provisions of the instant Act dependent thereon, are unconstitutional under the First Amendment.

CONCLUSION

The judgment below should be reversed; the registration order should be held unconstitutional; and the Act's provision for registration of "Communist-action organizations", together with all provisions dependent thereon, should likewise be held unconstitutional.

Respectfully submitted,

BRIEF OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION AS AMICUS CURIAE

---

This brief is filed pursuant to the consent of the attorneys for the parties.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

We believe that the two prime questions presented to this Court are:

1. Is the Internal Security Act of 1950 constitutional?
2. Is the Order appealed from and directed to petitioner, Communist Party of the United States of America, a valid Order under the Act?

CONDITIONS LEADING TO ENACTMENT

Over a period of years, antedating the enactment of this statute in 1950, the Congress of the United States had received detailed and convincing information that enemies of our form of government were actively at work to destroy the American system. Furthermore, it was shown that these enemies were under the domination and control of a foreign government. In addition, the elected representatives of the people determined that the enemies in question were intent on accomplishing their program by force and violence rather than through change in our constitutional system by orderly process.

From official sources, such as the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and other security agencies, the Congress received sworn testimony that the aims of communists were in furtherance of world revolution and the triumph of international communism. The achievement of this aim, the reports showed, would mean the violent and complete destruction of the United States government.

The Congress determined that the concerted activities of the Communist Party constituted a menace to the established order, and that the systematic interference of a foreign power in the domestic affairs of this country constituted a source of grave danger.

Throughout the period in question, committees of the Congress conducted investigations and hearings to ascertain all facts bearing upon the situation. Witnesses, who had held important positions within the communist network, testified as to the communist program of infiltration into the government service, defense plants, sensitive areas and the field of education in the United States. The law-making branch also learned that universities and colleges of the country had conducted separate inquiries of their own and had established facts which resulted in the expulsion of professors and teachers who failed to satisfy the responsible authorities of these institutions that they were loyal to the United States government.

Not only did committees of Congress investigate in Washington this information indicating that the security of the nation was being threatened by subversion; but they went to various parts of the country holding hearings in order to secure "on the spot" information as to the existence and extent of such dangers. The findings of the Congressional committees were reported to the United States Senate and House of Representatives and were available to all at the time the legislation leading up to the Internal Security Act of 1950 was under consideration.

It was against that background that the Congress legislated in 1950. The reports of the Committees, the thorough-going debates on the floor and the extensive consideration before the roll-call votes of both Houses on the several votes taken all combine to indicate that the action taken by the majority of the people's elected representatives was a deliberate one, and not a hurried judgment. The widespread public support for such legislation was demonstrated by the passage of the bill over the President's veto by the overwhelming vote in the Senate of 57 to 10 and in the House of 286 to 48.

It was the final decision of the legislative branch of the government to protect the security of the nation. Such judgment of our coordinate branch of the government must not be lightly overthrown. Congress, in the Act, Section 2, stated the necessity for such legislation.

As to the then existing conditions, see the concurring opinion of Justice Jackson in Dennis v. United States, argued December 4, 1950, decided June 4, 1951, 341 U.S. 561-570.

RESOLUTION OF AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

At its Annual Meeting in Washington, D. C., on September 22, 1950, the American Bar Association through its Assembly and House of Delegates duly adopted a resolution that "world conditions and the objectives as set forth" in the proposed Internal Security Act of 1950 "require the prompt enactment of the legislation for the security of the nation" and recommended the passage of such legislation. (See 75 A.B.A.Rep. 149 (1950)).

ARGUMENT

I

Congress Has the Duty and the Power to Enact Laws To Safeguard the Security and Welfare of the Nation.

There is no purpose or power in government more fundamental than the protection of the nation from invasion, domination or subversion.

The duty and the power were specifically vested by the people in our federal government by constitutional mandate. The words of the Preamble "insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare * * *" were supported by the specific grants of powers in Article I, Section 8. To amplify those express powers, the Constitution further provided Congress with the general power "To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof."

The power of Congress to protect our people embraces every phase of national security. The duty of self-preservation must be exercised within the framework of the Constitution. The duty and the power of the Congress have well been restated by this Court in Dennis v. United States 341 U.S. 494 (by Chief Justice Vinson at page 501; by Justice Frankfurter at page 519).

There can be no individual rights or freedoms without national security.

In the light of existing conditions the Congress would have been derelict in its duty had it not enacted legislation within its power deemed by it adequate to protect the national welfare. The country was entitled to protection—not alibis or epitaphs.

Where no constitutional or statutory provision is violated, the courts are no more immune from the duty to safeguard the nation than is the Congress or the President.

II

The Act Is Constitutional

If the Act, as applied to this petitioner, is unconstitutional this Court must and should so declare. However, with great respect for this Court, but with equal firmness, we submit that only the constitutionality of the Act and the validity of the Order under the Act are the concern of this Court. In nowise is it the prerogative of this or any other court to pass upon the wisdom or the lack of wisdom of the method or the provisions chosen by the Congress—within its constitutional powers—to safeguard the nation from the menace that was obvious to it and to the people of this nation. That this Court or any of its members might deem a different plan or other provisions within the Constitution more effective and more desirable is wholly immaterial. Changes in the Act in the light of experience may hereafter be required, but that, too, is the duty of the Congress and not of this Court.

The essentials of legislative functions are preserved when Congress authorizes a statutory command to become operative upon ascertainment of a basic conclusion of fact by a designated representative of the government.

Due process requires appraisal in light of conditions confronting Congress during the continuation of the challenged action. (Kiyoshi Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81)

The issues being numerous, however, our views, of necessity, will be restricted primarily to what we conceive to be the more significant issues presented.[1] In discussing these questions, we necessarily do so, of course, from the standpoint that the Communist Party is, as found, and as we believe, "a communist-action organization," as defined.

In order to consider the First Amendment and due process questions, as applied to petitioner, it must be done in the proper setting.

[1] We are of the opinion that some of the questions, for varying reasons, do not warrant consideration by the Court on the merits, e.g., the self-incrimination question, which we believe is premature, and the preponderance of the evidence question, which we believe was correctly decided by the Court below in which was vested by the Act the responsibility for determining the sufficiency of the evidence, and in discharging this duty it is evident from the Court's opinion that there was "a fair assessment" of the record, thus leaving this Court to invoke "'. . . the usual rule of non-interference . . .'". National Labor Relations Board v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 340 U.S. 498, 502-503. Again, the so-called sanction provisions do not lend themselves readily to sharp scrutiny since they do not come here in the context of the usual case or controversy. We discuss the "sanctions" nevertheless.

Fairness of procedure, as provided in the Act, is due process in the primary sense. (Brinkerhoff-Faris Trust Co., v. Hill 281 U.S. 673, 681).

This Court takes judicial notice that findings of the legislature have support in facts. (Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398; Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry Co. v. United States, 284 U.S. 248).

Succinctly then, we state what petitioner has been found to be and not to be by respondent and the Court below.

It has been determined not to be just one of those "unpopular causes" or a bona fide, domestic political party, albeit radical. It has been determined to be an organization serving under the control of the Soviet Union, an organization which will accept twists of discipline, intellectual and otherwise,[2] from the former and, under the control of the Soviet Union, has as its purpose the destruction of our form of government by unconstitutional means. (Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U.S. 123; Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494; American Communications Assn. v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382).

In this setting, we turn to the First Amendment question.

The Communist Party-petitioner's contention that the Act violates its freedom of speech under the First Amendment is without merit. Section 1 of the Act eliminates any basis for such argument.

By no sane or sound construction of the Act can it be deemed to control freedom of thought or of speech or to apply to radical espousal or radical organizations unless they result from foreign domination of the communist movement. No organization and no individual—however radical but not so dominated—is encompassed by this Act. Nor is any person or organization prevented from advocating any change, however far-reaching, however unsound, however obnoxious, through change in our Constitution.

[2] For example, its gyrations in regard to fascism and Nazi Germany before and during the World War II era.

Article V of the Constitution provides one of the greatest of all rights—possibly even the greatest—that of the people to effect any change in our government by the adoption of appropriate amendment to the Constitution. Orderly change in the government by choice of the people is not one of the basic concepts of communism, which espouses rather subversion and violent revolution. In no country that communism dominates has it achieved power by the free choice of its people—not even in Russia.

The Purpose Of The Act Is To Safeguard This Nation And Its People. The Act Is Carefully Drawn And Fixes Adequate Standards.

The registration features require disclosure by petitioner and so-called sanctions on petitioner and its members automatically flow therefrom. It is our view that reasonable disclosure is entirely consistent with the thesis that the best approach to erroneous doctrines is exposure. Members of this Court have, in effect, so stated. (Viereck v. United States, 318 U.S. 236, 251, Mr. Justice Black dissenting, with Mr. Justice Douglas concurring). The required diselosure here is within what a sovereignty is surely entitled to know from an organization within its borders dedicated to its overthrow.

What petitioner seems to contend, in effect, is that it is constitutionally objectionable to cause the required disclosures by an organization which seeks to overthrow our government while nowhere coming to grips with the proposition that a simple foreign agents' registration act is indisputably constitutional.[3] If this implication were taken to its logical conclusion, it would result in the contention that though faced with the proposition that a foreign agents' registration act is constitutional, it is unconstitutional if applied to an organization supported by a foreign power and a world movement which pose a grave threat to our national well-being. Thus, required registration and disclosure by an innocuous foreign agent would be constitutional but not so if required of one that has a harmful purpose.

The next question is whether the registration features of the Act are unreasonable, all things considered. The answer is "No". It is quite prudent that our government require that a domestic organization, supported as it is by the Soviet Union, register for what it is and reveal its officers and membership, as well as its finances. This is, under the circumstances, a restrained attempt to gain self-protective information and inform the public. Even now ingredients are required to be labeled under the Pure Food and Drug Act. Lobbyists are compelled to register. Securities offered for sale are required to be listed. To protect the public, states require their corporations to identify themselves as such by the addition of the words, "Corporation," "Inc.," "Limited" or other designation. It is apparent that the determination and Order that petitioner label itself "a Communist Organization" under the Act is a "bone in the throat."

The Order will no doubt curtail the former effectiveness of the Communist Party in this country—not so much because of the registration requirement, but because of the determination—under law—of its true conspiratorial nature and its foreign domination. Its consequent inability to secure cooperation and collaboration of thousands of innocent persons for its secret and traitorous work, as in the past, is one of the very objectives of the Act.

[3] Cf. Viereck v. United States, supra, where the constitutionality of the Foreign Agents Registration Act then under review was not even attacked as being unconstitutional.

Legitimate political parties have not died or become ineffective because of the requirement for reporting campaign contributions and expenditures.

The petitioner's contention that the Act is "one of outlawry" has neither basis nor merit. The Act is directed to every communist-action organization whatever it be, or whatever its name. Any organization coming within the purview or purpose of the Act would be required to register or, upon its failure so to do, would after petition and hearing, be so ordered by the Board. If the Democratic, Republican, Prohibition, or any other political party were ever to become dominated by a foreign communist power, as provided in the Act, it would be subject to the same requirements and a similar Order as that appealed from.

The truth and the fact, well established before the Board, as well as in criminal trials and Congressional investigations, is that the petitioner, the Communist Party, is not a "political party" in the sense used by the American people, but is a foreign dominated group posing as a political party for subversive purposes. Justice Jackson's description in the Dennis case, 341 U.S. at 565-566, of the purpose, the method, and the effectiveness of a similar traitorous foreign dominated communist group in Czechoslovakia demonstrates the tragedy of a nation's failure at self-preservation.

Petitioner contends that to register would be to tarnish itself and lose for it access to the market place of ideas. If this speculation be true, petitioner must look elsewhere than to the Constitution for relief. The Constitution does not salvage from reasonable regulation those seeking, under foreign control, its destruction. (Cf. Dennis v. United States 341 U.S. 494).

Notwithstanding the definition of a communist-action organization, which petitioner meets, it seeks support from Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516. But petitioner may not in the context of this case assume its role to be analogous to that of a labor organizer engaged in legitimate activities. The context here is so vastly different as to make Collins inapplicable. Nor, as petitioner contends, is there support for it in Herndon v. Lowry 301 U.S. 242 or DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, both criminal cases. In the former, the Court held that the statute, as applied, violated the Fourteenth Amendment since ". . . the requisite proof is lacking.[*]" (p. 259), and "[t]he statute, as construed and applied in appellant's trial, does not furnish a sufficiently ascertainable standard of guilt." (p. 260). In DeJonge, the Court held that the state may not "seize upon mere participation in a peaceable assembly and a lawful public discussion as the basis for a criminal charge." (p. 365); and that the "statute as applied to the particular charge as defined by the state court is repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." (p. 366)

It is one thing to say that one may not be jailed under the circumstances of those cases and quite another thing to say that petitioner may not under the Act and on the record in this case be required to make disclosure and its members denied access to the areas covered. Further, there is not here a failure of the proof to meet the statute.

After it is the law of the land that an organization is determined to be a communist-action organization, it is

[*] The Court found that in the address in question the statutory requirement ". . . incitement or attempted incitement to insurrection by violence" was lacking (p. 259).

our view that the government may and should take reasonable protective measures in regard to the organization and its then fully apprised members and withdraw such governmental benefits as it would be fool-hardy to continue to bestow.

The determination of this appeal must be based upon the fundamental purposes of government contained in the Constitution, and not on imaginary, conjectures of matters not now before the Court. Conjuring inapplicable, hypothetical future cases is not a new tactic in presenting communist appeals to this Court. (See opinion of Vinson, C.J., Dennis v. United States, supra at page 502.) Neither may the conjecture or assumption that individuals will violate the law be the basis for testing its constitutional validity.

The Sanction Provisions Are Within the Constitutional Powers of the Congress

At the outset, the Court may well, realistically, excise from consideration the sanctions relating to federal and defense facility employment since, as is generally known, those areas are, without regard to this legislation, presently not open to Communist Party members under existing regulations;[5] and the same would apply to the passport question since passports are denied to Communist Party members under existing departmental regulations, 22 C.F.R. § 51.135 et seq.

Discussing first those "sanctions" relating primarily to the organization, as such, we consider the requirement that it label publications for mailing or delivery in interstate commerce and announce its sponsorship of broadcasts. The publications and broadcast provisions being identical, in principle, only the publication provision will be discussed.

[5] See Executive Order 10450, dated April 27, 1953 (18 F. R. 2489); see, also, Bailey v. Richardson, 182 F. 2d 46 (C.A.D.C.), affirmed 341 U.S. 918.

In essence, this provision, as applied here, amounts to no more than a requirement that petitioner utilize a letterhead on such publications and wrappers, something almost all organizations do automatically, even unpopular ones. It is no burden for the Communist Party to call itself "a communist organization"; and certainly, too, no organization is harmed by a letterhead unless deception is its aim. These provisions, therefore, strike us as reasonable in context.

The tax provision is simply a withdrawal of a matter of grace, Helvering v. Ohio Leather Co., 317 U.S. 102. The prohibition of contributions to a communist-action organization by federal and defense facility employees is no different in principle from the Hatch Act prohibition of political activity by federal employees. United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75. It is far more deleterious to the government for its employees materially to support a communist-action organization than to engage in bona fide political activities. If it may prohibit such contributions by federal employees, it may do likewise in regard to defense facility employees since petitioner's roots are in the soil of the foreign nation accountable for most of our defense facilities.

The provision prohibiting holding office in or employment by labor organizations is, we submit, within the rationale of American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, where this Court sustained the validity of the so-called non-communist affidavit provision of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (§ 9(h)). In the years between 1947 and the passage of this amendment to the Act at bar (1954) Congress must have concluded from the experience of those trying years that an extension of the non-communist affidavit provision was warranted and, under Douds, is valid.

The provisions applicable to aliens relate to (a) deportation and exclusion, (b) ineligibility for naturalization and (c) denaturalization proceedings. This Court having decided the validity of the deportation and exclusion provision in Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, as petitioner concedes, there appears no point in discussing it further. It would seem, likewise, that, in view of the broad powers of Congress in relation to the grant of citizenship, it may withhold citizenship from aliens who though advised by the law of the land of the nature of the Communist Party, nevertheless insist on being members of or affiliating with it. As to the denaturalization provisions, we believe the Court below correctly declined to entertain their validity, stating ". . . denaturalization does not flow automatically from registration [and] . . . [n]o such case is before [the Court] . . ." as " . . . a regular proceeding for the purpose must be brought . . ." Communist Party of United States v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 223 F. 2d 531, 557. In any event, the rebuttable presumption created in the denaturalization proceeding is entirely reasonable in context and adequate notice to the individual is present.

This brings us to the question of whether, as contended (Pet. Br. 72, 75), the member-sanctions violate the First Amendment and the due process of law clause by ". . . imposing liability on individuals . . . solely because of their association . . . [and] without regard to the member's lack of knowledge of the claimed illicit purposes of the organization . . .". (Pet. Br. 73)

There is no question here of penalizing possibly innocent, unknowing association (Weiman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183). Before any liability attaches it will have been declared the law that petitioner is a communist-action organization, with all that imports, and such fact will in addition be published in the Federal Register, which under the Act constitutes notice to all members (§ 13 (k)).[6] There comes a time when a member of an organization must be held to be aware of its nature and purposes and surely that time arrives when he is so advised by the Supreme Court of the United States, which would be the case here. If he then desires to remain a member, it is reasonable, in this case, that his name be registered. And, in any event, the element of scienter would have to be established if he were prosecuted, as in any other criminal prosecution. The members, therefore, have due process of law protection.

There is likewise no First Amendment violation. Upon a determination that an organization within its confines is a communist-action organization, Congress would be less than vigilant if it did not close off vulnerable areas (employment and passport provisions) and withdraw grants (alien provisions). After such judicial determination, Congress is not restricted to an expression of consternation, but, rather, may take reasonable, protective measures. And it has.

The petitioner—the Communist Party of the United States of America—has no right whatever under the self-incrimination provision of the Fifth Amendment, nor may it defeat the Act or the Order by indirectly invoking the Fifth Amendment through conjecturing future cases involving the rights of individuals who may be its officers or members. The right under the Fifth Amendment is a personal right granted only to individuals. The constitutional right of every individual against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment must, and will be, preserved to him. Such right is not lost by anything contained in the Act. Whenever properly asserted, the courts will protect such rights (Blau v. U. S. 340 U. S. 332).

The Fifth Amendment contains no equal protection clause and it restrains only such discriminating legislation by Congress as amounts to a denial of due process. (Kiyoshi Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81; Detroit Bank v. United States, 317 U.S. 329, 337, 338.

This Court may not, and should not, test the constitutionality of the Act or the validity of the Order as affecting this petitioner on the assumption in advance that individuals will refuse to obey the law or the Order. Such individuals may willingly comply. Whatever problems may be developed at a later date, and in future cases, they may not be the basis on this appeal of declaring the Act void or the Order invalid as affecting this petitioner.

The effectiveness of the Act must be distinguished from its constitutionality. This Act is constitutional although its enforcement might hereafter encounter such objections over the constitutional rights of the individual officers or members as to render the Act partially ineffective. The constitutionality of the Act and not its wisdom or its effectiveness is now before this Court.

III

THE ORDER AGAINST THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA HAS BEEN PROPERLY MADE BY THE BOARD.

Due process has been accorded the petitioner. The real complaint of the petitioner, Communist Party of the United States of America, is not that it did not receive a fair hearing, but that despite its every effort and tactic to prevent it, a thorough hearing was held and a just determination finally made. The hearing was in full accordance with the constitutional provisions of due process and the American concept of justice.

The findings of the Board require and fully sustain the ultimate determination that the Communist Party of the United States of America is a "communist-action organization", as defined in the Act. The Order entered is valid in all respects.

The Court below, after thorough examination of the record, sustained the Board's findings with but slight and immaterial change as to two findings. In a detailed opinion by Prettyman, J., the majority has affirmed the Order of the Board. The dissenting jurist was lead into the very error we have contended against of determining this appeal by this petitioner on the basis of the possible future violation of some individual's rights.

This Court is bound by the findings of fact as found by the Board and the Court below.

The Order is valid and proper under the Act and should be affirmed.

CONCLUSION

Much has been said and written by the petitioner on the dangers to American freedom if the Act and Order here under review are upheld. It is suggested to the Court, by petitioner, the Communist Party, and other amici curiae in substance, that the Act is fundamentally totalitarian in nature.

This is not so. A respondent in proceedings under the Act has complete constitutional protection and is afforded full appellate protection with a mandate to the Court of Appeals that in reviewing the sufficiency of the evidence the Court determine whether a preponderance is present, not merely whether as is customary, there is substantial evidence to support an Order of registration. Respondents before the Board have, for example, the use of subpoena power, the right to counsel, the right of cross-examination and the right of rebuttal (Section 13.)

Further, there is nothing in the Act to penalize unwitting individuals or organizations of bygone days.

It is pure fantasy to suggest that validation of the Act will result in "orthodoxy of non-deviation." And if we thought so we would not be here supporting the Act and the Order. As the Court below cogently stated, in a case involving an organization where domination by another is in issue, it is necessary to examine the policies of each, as all circumstances considered, identity of policies may well be probative and is one element to consider. Communist Party case, supra, pp. 560-61. But one may not reasonably conclude from this that because of the Act individuals or organizations are any less free to speak or publish their views. What is really contended, in effect, is that the Act will inevitably be maladministered and that innocents will be, or will fear being, trapped for sincere expressions of views. The answer to the first is that no reasonable construction of the Act supports such a conclusion and certainly no innocents will be trapped "while this Court sits". Holmes, J., in Panhandle Oil Company v. Knox 277 U.S. 218, at 223. No organizations or individuals who place trust in our institutions need, therefore, feel impelled to "orthodoxy" because of the Act. Not to our knowledge have the dire forebodings made before and after the Act's passage come true and, with a sound administration of the Act, there is no cause for them to come true in the future.

It is being urged upon the Court that to affirm in this case would be to damage the nation's standing at home and abroad and that the "new spirit of conciliation[7] . . . is incompatible with the premise of the Act . . ."

Those arguments, outside the record, are not properly addressed to this Court but must be addressed to the Congress.

[7] This is a reference to the recent Geneva Conference.

Each of the Act's provisions, in context, and the Act in toto are, we contend, reasonable and valid.

To the extent that the current era may be thought to play upon the Congressional findings in the Act, we might say that in a period when most objective observers agree that the Soviet Union may be writing in the sands, it is important that the American people know, for example, who is propagandizing them, i.e., whether it be a communist-action organization or one truly interesfed in preserving our constitutional system.

The experience of recent history, which Congress had before it, shows that it is unwise to take petitioner lightly and pass it off as merely an organization of malcontents. It has been proven that with such approach its members may soon become imbedded to an astounding degree in our national structure by ruse and artifice.

We contend that the "spotlight of pitiless publicity"[8] should be turned on the Communist Party and it is reasonable that its members should be covered by the Act in the interest of the nation's well-being.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AS AMICI CURIAE

To the Honorable Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

The undersigned, as counsel for the American citizens, whose names are hereto attached (Appendix A), respectfully moves this Honorable Court for permission to file the accompanying brief, amici curiae. The attorneys for the petitioner have consented to the filing of this brief.

Permission for leave to file has been requested from the Solicitor General of the United States. A copy of this request is hereto attached (App. B). The Solicitor General has not acceded to the request on the ground that he does not see a direct enough interest on our part but has stated that if a timely motion is made to this Court for such permission he will not oppose it (App. C).

Any American may be or may wish to become a member of an organization which may fall within the purview of the Act. We submit, therefore, that every American has an interest in the outcome of this case that is both real and direct. Every American, if the Act is upheld, may well hesitate to remain or become a member of any organization which may be found to fall within purview of the Act. The Act establishes a barrier of non-association with any person who espouses "dangerous" causes and non-association in the affairs of any organization which espouses, or might espouse, controversial views.

The Act itself destroys the very democratic processes which, in another type of case, we would be asked to rely on for its correction and forces us back to relying on the interpretation of the Constitution by this honorable Court.

We are aware that this solution of the problem gives rise to a procedural difficulty. On the one hand, the nature of the problem is such, and its bearing on the rights of every citizen so great and immediate, as to suggest that every interested individual ought to have a right to be heard before the tribunal charged with responsibility for the final decision. On the other hand, the judicial process is adapted to hearing the claims of a small number of persons whose involvement in the immediate problem makes them parties before the Court. The device of the amicus curiae brief resolves this dilemma as well as we are able to resolve it. It permits us to express, in a form traditional and appropriate to the judicial process, our profound conviction that it is our liberties—and not just those of the Communist Party—on which the Court is being asked to rule. Moreover, no matter how ably the attorneys for the Communist Party may present the case, it is their right and duty to present it from the point of view of and the effect on the Communist Party and Communists. We desire to present the evils of the Act from the point of view of non-Communists. Nor, we submit, is our presentation premature since different questions may be involved as to non-Communist and Communist organization. The Act must be judged and its constitutionality determined in the light of its total impact and that impact is not limited by the details of this, on any other, particular proceeding.

A summary of the points to be made is contained in the index of the brief which is hereto annexed and made a part of this motion.

WHEREFORE, it is respectfully requested that this Honorable Court grant this motion to file the annexed brief as amici curiae.

BRIEF AS FRIENDS OF THE COURT

Statement

It is with the deepest concern over what we, the undersigned, believe to be the most terrible threat so far devised to freedom in America, the "Internal Security Act of 1950" that we request permission to file this brief. We cherish the ideal which gave our country birth and made it a mighty instrument in human progress, the ideal of a free people living under a government by law in which the few may not tyrannize over the many or the many over the few. We believe that such a concept of government, valuable as it has been in the past, is essential now. We believe that never before in our history has freedom to dissent, freedom to be different, freedom to experiment, freedom even to be wrong fallen into such a low estate nor the possibility that "government of, by and for the people" may pass from the American scene been more real. We believe that a new era opened in international affairs at Geneva which demands an agonizing reappraisal of the "clear and present danger" found to exist when this Court upheld the Smith Act. We believe as the eminent group of scientists, headed by the late Albert Einstein, recently said that:

> "There lies before us, if we choose, continual progress in happiness, knowledge and wisdom. Shall we, instead, choose death because we cannot forget our quarrels?

> We appeal, as human beings to human beings, remember humanity and forget the rest. If you can do so, the way lies open to a new paradise; if you cannot, there lies before you the risk of universal death."

We believe not merely freedom from war but freedom to think and freedom to dissent to be prerequisites of entering the world of promise, the way to which is open. We urge upon this honorable Court the need for America to recover the distinction between dissent and treason.

We hold as a firm tenet of our faith that violent revolutions should never be resorted to in a society where orderly change through the will of the people, freely expressed at the polls, is possible. We believe, however, that radicals as well as liberals and conservatives must, in such a society as ours, be guaranteed the right, within the framework of the democratic process, to urge changes which they seek. Radicals in the past have often been wrong but they have served a useful purpose, even when wrong, in calling attention to evils that demand correction. Any society which suppresses its most uncompromising critics runs the risk of becoming static. If there had not in every age been those who said, "Things are not good enough. We demand changes here," we would still be living in caves and wearing skins or loin cloths.

The truths for which we speak have found expression in memorable utterances by members of this Court.

In the August 1955 issue of The Progressive is an article by Chief Justice Warren in which he paid tribute to Bob LaFollette, which is prophetic in the truest sense of that word. The Chief Justice said:

> "There are still those among us who would call it (LaFollette's program) socialism; those who refuse to make any distinction between socialism and social progress; those whom Lincoln described as being unable to distinguish a horse chestnut from a chestnut horse.

> There will be such in every generation * * * freedom itself is radical * * *. Again he was squarely in the American tradition, with its reliance on the idealism and innate reasonableness of men. He had an old-fashioned faith in the sovereign power of reason in human affairs. But pre-eminently, Bob LaFollette was a dissenter—a dissenter in the finest sense of the word."

In his introduction to An Almanac of Liberty, Mr. Justice Douglas said:

> "There is room in this great and good American Family for all the diversities the Creator has produced in man. Our CONSTITUTION and BILL OF RIGHTS were, indeed, written to accommodate each and every minority, regardless of color, nationality, or creed. That is our democratic faith. Out of that diversity can come a unity the world has never witnessed.
>
> "The need these days is to practice and preach that democratic faith. It can easily become the most contagious political force the world has ever known. But we must first redeem it. In recent years, we have let it fall to low estate, as the people of Europe and Asia probably know better than we."

Mr. Justice Black, in his prophetic dissenting opinion in American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382 at 448, foresaw the possibility of such further encroachments on freedom as we have in this Act when he said:

> "But not the least of the virtues of the First Amendment is its protection of each member of the smallest and most unorthodox minority. Centuries of experience testify that laws aimed at one political or religious group, however rational these laws may be in their beginnings, generate hatreds and prejudices which rapidly spread beyond control. Too often it is fear which inspires such passions, and nothing is more reckless or contagious. In the resulting hysteria, popular indignation tars with the same brush all those who have ever *been associated with any members of the group under attack or who hold a view which, though supported by revered Americans as essential to democracy, has been adopted by that group for its own purposes * * *. Guilt should not be imputed solely from association or affiliation with political parties or any other organization, however much we abhor the ideas which they advocate * * . Fears of alien ideologies have frequently agitated the nation and inspired legislation aimed at suppressing advocacy of those ideologies. At such times the fog of public excitement obscures the ancient landmarks set up in our Bill of Rights. Yet then, of all times should this Court adhere most closely to the course they mark." (Emphasis supplied.)

Mr. Justice Burton joined in an opinion with Mr. Justice Jackson in Terminello v. Chicago, 337 U. S. 1 where he said at p. 36:

"Suppression has never been a successful permanent policy; any surface serenity that it creates is a false security; while conspiratorial forces go underground. My confidence in American institutions and in the sound sense of the American people is such that with a stroke of the pen I could silence every fascist and communist speaker, I would not do it. For I agree with Woodrow Wilson who said: 'I have always been among those who believed that the greatest freedom of speech was the greatest safety, because if a man is a fool, the best thing to do is to encourage him to advertise the fact by speaking.'"

In his letter to the Chairman of the Loyalty Review Board dated November 29, 1947, Mr. Justice Clark, then Attorney General, gave the following memorable warning:

"In connection with the designation of these organizations I wish to reiterate, as the President has pointed out, that it is entirely possible that many persons belonging to such organizations may be loyal to the United States; that membership in, affiliation with, or sympathetic association with, any organization desig> nated, is simply one piece of evidence which may or may not be helpful in arriving at a conclusion as to the action which is to be taken in a particular case. 'Guilt by association' has never been one of the principles of our American jurisprudence. We must be satisfied that reasonable grounds exist for concluding that an individual is disloyal. That must be the guide." (Letter of Tom C. Clark, Attorney General, November 29, 1947, to the Chairman of the Loyalty Review Board.) (Emphasis supplied.)

In his concurring opinion in Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, Mr. Justice Frankfurter pointed out at p. 548 that:

> "The treatment of its minorities, especially their legal position, is among the most searching tests of the level of civilization attained by a society. It is better for those who have almost unlimited power of government in their hands to err on the side of freedom. We have enjoyed so much freedom for so long that we are perhaps in danger of forgetting how much blood it cost to establish the Bill of Rights."

We respectfully submit that this is a case squarely within that concept of the Bill of Rights which was enunciated by President James Madison, who was one of its authors and protagonists. He declared:

> "The Bill of Rights is not a grant of privileges handed down to them (the people) by the government, but rather it is a curb and restriction laid upon government by the people. The Bill of Rights, we must remember always, is an instrument. It must be wielded and cared for by each generation."

The undersigned submit this brief in the profound conviction that decision of the present case is one of the most momentous constitutional responsibilities which has ever been thrust upon this Court.

Presented for this Court's decision is the constitutional validity of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950.

This, of course, is the short title which Congress has assigned to those provisions of the Internal Security Act of 1950, consituting Title I of that act, as amended which undertake to define "Communist-action," "Communist-front," and "Communist-infiltrated" organizations, impose a variety of sanctions on such organizations and their members, which set up procedures and a tribunal by which any voluntary association of private citizens in the United States can be subjected to a political trial, and which impose on the tribunal created to hold such trials a significant series of prejudgments.

This act we believe, and will try to demonstrate more fully below, has two principal features. The first is that it imposes penalties and civil disabilities on American Communists, designed to destroy their movement as completely as possible, not for plotting violent revolution, not even for "advocating" it, not for anything they are found guilty of having done or said, not even for being "foreign agents," as that term is ordinarily understood, but simply for being associated with Communists of other countries in an international movement and for sharing the ideas of Communists of other countries, especially, of course, those of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

Since this aspect of the Act will be argued to the Court by parties to the record, we will focus our attention chiefly on the Act's second principal feature. This is that it represses the organizational activities of non-Communist Americans whenever they are found to have associated with Communists for any purpose, however innocent, to have collaborated with Communists for the attainment of any objective, however lawful and proper, or to have agreed with Communists concerning ideas and policies, even though the points of agreement may have been very remote indeed from the particular ideas and policies for which the Communists are assertedly condemned.

This, it seems to us, is nothing less than the legislation of a new orthodoxy. It is an orthodoxy of non-association with any person who is, or might become suspect, of non-participation in the affairs of any organization which espouses, or might espouse, controversial views. Above all, it is an orthodoxy of non-deviation from the policies and proposals of those who, on any issue, most loudly and successfully contend that whoever does not agree with them must agree with the Communists and hence must be pro-Communist. This would indeed produce the unanimity of the graveyard. West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624, 641.

The great controversial issues of the day—the very issues on which we stand most in need of free, fearless, and uninhibited discussion—are characteristically two-sided issues. There are conscientious Americans on both sides of each of them. In conformity with our traditions, we cannot assume that either side has acquired a monopoly of truth or that the other has nothing to say which it would be to our benefit to hear.

On each of these questions, as the record in this case demonstrates, the Communist Party has taken, or is likely to take a position. The Court of Appeals found the ultimate Communist aim to be a stateless and classless world. However visionary, this is not an illegal or immoral objective. The opinion shows that Communists have many objectives and policies. Its immediate objectives include maintaining peace. A religious or peace organization which approved the results of the Geneva conference and urged further efforts toward ending the cold war would be supporting a Communist objective. Statements which are lawful for the President of the United States or the National Council of Churches to make may become evidence as furthering Communist objectives if made by lesser people. By the reasoning which underlies this Act, the side for which Communists express a preference becomes thereby the Communist side. The organizations on that side must thenceforth change their views, disband, or risk being required to stand trial before the Subversive Activities Control Board on a charge of "non-deviation."

As Professor Zechariah Chafee, Jr., possibly our outstanding authority on freedom of speech, has so aptly demonstrated, the effect of this Act is thus to deny organized expression to one side, but not the other, on each of the great debates of the day (63 Harvard Law Review 1382). In our complexly interlocking society, exposed daily and hourly to the opinion-shaping influence of press, radio, television and other mass communication media, the idea which is denied organized expression, while its rival enjoys these advantages, has no chance in the market place, whatever its intrinsic merit. The practical effect, therefore, is to suppress one side of each these questions and erect the other into a semi-official compulsory creed.

This is no chimera, for already the forces which produced this Act have carried us far along that road. Already, on many of the issues of the day, we have seen beginning to develop a safe and orthodox side, which the prudent espouse out of prudence with little examination, and a dangerous and "subversive" side, which only the bold care to listen to, read or examine. Just at the moment when this tendency is, happily, beginning to subside, this Act, if the Court upholds it, will freeze that tendency and convert it into an institution.

The Congress which adopted this Act thereby expressed its understanding that the current danger to our institutions is that the American people will take ideas at their face value and judge them on their merits, instead of on the political backgrounds of those who put them forth. This indiscretion, the Act seems to say, may cause them to be lured by handsome strangers with no security clearance into dark byways where they will be seduced by false doctrines and persuaded to betray their country.

We submit that, not only is this opinion without rational foundation, but that even its irrational foundation has long since passed away. The real and present danger is that the sudden rise in the world of a powerful ideology, rival to our own, and the fears, hatreds, frustrations and confusions generated by this unexpected and unexplained phenomenon, may cause us to lose sight of the meaning of our own heritage and to destroy it in the name of defending it. This Act, we feel, brings precisely that danger to a profound crisis, perhaps to a turning point.

This danger threatens loss of liberty more gravely and more imminently than any minority political movement could ever threaten it. The danger, however, may not be limited to loss of liberty. Involved also is the fact that we are being urged—and, by this Act, compelled—to stake our survival on methods which history has shown have little survival value. We are asked to meet the challenge of the rival world ideology by becoming rigid and unbending, although history has shown that societies which cannot bend are not so much strong as brittle. We are urged to close ranks around our own ideology by adopting a coerced conformity. Yet the principal result of coerced conformity in other countries has been to destroy the delicate and complex machinery by which the mistakes which fallible leaders and statesmen must necessarily make can be detected and corrected before it is too late. We submit that the world of 1955 is not one in which even the world's strongest country should risk walking blindfolded.

It is with these considerations in mind that we respectfully submit, for the Court's consideration, the following brief.

ARGUMENT

I. The Act is unconstitutional as an overhanging threat to the exercise of rights protected by the First Amendment.

We think it unnecessary to dwell at length on a demonstration that, whatever conduct is reached by this Act is not merely regulated, but is penalized most severely—one might even say savagely.

Affected organizations are compelled to publish, when they publish anything, an estimate of themselves which, in the context of our time, must necessarily do them incalculable damage (Sec. 10). They are required to publish this in a form which resembles, as much as possible, a voluntary declaration representing their own opinion of their nature and purpose. Yet it may well amount to compulsory self-defamation, since those who believe in the organization and desire to see it continued may very well be the ones who stubbornly refuse to share the Board's opinion that it is "a Communist organization." Whether they share it or not, they are required to express it or be silent altogether, under extremely heavy criminal penalties (Sec. 15(c)). They are even required to express this opinion in a manner (putting it on the outside wrapper, as well as on the material itself) which could not conceivably serve any function or purpose except to frighten recipients into requesting that their names be removed from the mailing list.

If an organization which has fallen under the Board's ban desires to publish any opinion whatever, however moderate and reasoned, on any subject whatever, from social security to what ought to be done about the hydrogen bomb, it cannot do so without attaching to that opinion a label. This label, whether justifiably or not, will be widely understood as a declaration that the enclosure is Communist propaganda and that social security (or whatever the organization desires to advocate) is "Communistic." That a given program is "Communistic" is typically the view, not of organizations formed to promote the program, but of the program's most fiery and irreconcilable opponents. Yet, in effect, it is this view, not its own, which the organization is required to publish—or be silent.

The labeling provisions of the Act are closely analogous to the device of compulsory arm-band identification, to which this Court has had occasion to refer. American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, 402. Professor Chafee has aptly said of them, before they were brought forward from the Mundt-Nixon Bill into the present Act: "This novel stigma recalls the practice of medieval princes to require Jews to wear special marks on their coats" (63 Harv. L. Rev. 1382, 1384).

Solely for their membership in disapproved organizations, the Act bars an incalculable number of persons from employment by the government, by a "defense facility," or by a labor union (Sec. 5). The government is already our largest employer. Production in any major industry might effect the nation's ability to defend itself. Thus the doors close automatically to an enormous fraction of the labor market. If the term "defense facility" is broadly interpreted this fraction can be expanded to cover very nearly the whole of it. It must be remembered also that many of the persons affected will be dependent for employment on special skills, knowledge or experience for which there is no demand outside the closed area. This is punishment of a most severe kind. U. S. v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303. It is a proscription many times more sweeping than that involved in Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, and Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277.

We put to one side as of little practical importance the distinction between members of "Communist-action" organizations, who are prohibited from accepting or retaining employment in a defense facility, and members of "Communist-front" organizations who, "in seeking, accepting, or holding" such employment, must not "fail to disclose" their membership. The distinction is without a difference under the circumstances. If the atmosphere were such that the employee could entertain substantial hope of being employed despite such a revelation, the Act would not have been passed.

It is true that the sanctions discussed above are apparently inapplicable to "Communist-infiltrated" organizations, since the Act does not require the latter to register. However, the face of the Act makes it plain that the "Communist-infiltrated" category is aimed primarily, if not exclusively, at unions. Unions found to fit this category are subjected to virtual outlawry, since they are forbidden to carry on the most important functions which a union exists to fulfill (Sec. 13A(h)) and procedures obviously aimed at their displacement by rival organizations are set up (Sec. 13A(j)). Nor are we told by what means the organizations are supposed to find out whether there is Communist infiltration. Are they supposed to conduct internal witch hunts when even Congressional Committees armed with the powers of subpoena have found such difficulty in sifting fact from fancy in this area?

This Court has already recognized that, even without such sanctions, an official governmental designation of an organization as subversive severely cripples, if it does not proscribe it. Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123. The designation plus the sanction plainly attains the level of proscription by indirection. Even the majority opinion upholding the Act in the court below concedes that "realistically" the registration and accompanying sanctions will restrict freedom of expression (Op. p. 11). Somewhat more realistically, Professor Chafee has concluded with regard to provisions of the Mundt-Nixon Bill which have been brought forward (and even somewhat added to) in the Act: "All this virtually outlaws whatever organizations the [members of the Board] object to." 63

Harv. L. Rev. 1382, 1384. Yet it has frequently been noted by commentators on the operation of the American political system that our democracy has functioned through and been vitalized by voluntary association. As Professor Henry Steele Commager of Columbia University put it: "Most of our major reforms, political, social, moral were carried through by voluntary political associations. * * * Once the notion that joining may be dangerous is firmly established, all our organizations will be affected, and the American democracy will dry up at the roots." New York Times Magazine, November 8, 1953.

Most of these reforms were opposed as evil, socialistic or subversive. As Reverend Samuel J. May said of the abolitionists: "We are what we are * * *. It is unbecoming in abler men who stood by and would do nothing, to complain because we do not do better."

Congress itself has impliedly recognized right in the text of the Act that it was known to have, and intended to have, a highly penal effect. It is provided that the names of individuals shall not be published until they have had notice and an opportunity to deny the organizational connection. Sec. 9(b). An elaborate procedure is set up by which those able to prove non-membership in the affected organizations can get their names struck from the official blacklist. Secs. 7(g), 13(b), 13(i), 14(a). If the Act were genuinely regulatory, rather than punitive in substance and intent, such provisions would not have been thought necessary—or even thought of at all.

The real meaning of the Act is thus to be found in the conduct which organizations and individuals must forego in order to feel some assurance that these penalties will not be applied to them. We submit that the Act's standards are so vague, and their application so necessarily subjective, that no precaution can give entire assurance. However, the best hint as to what prudence requires is that given by Sec. 13(f)(4):

(f) In determining whether any organization is a "Communist-front organization," the Board shall take into consideration . . .

(4) the extent to which the positions taken or advanced by it from time to time on matters of policy do not deviate from those of any Communist-action organization, Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement referred to in section 2.

As we pointed out in our opening remarks, and as this record amply discloses, the Communist Party takes a position on a vast variety of issues which have no apparent connection with communism, indeed, on virtually every issue which is the subject of current debate. Since an organization cannot know in advance what "extent of non-deviation" will seem significant to the Board, its only safe course is total deviation. The prudent organization, confronted with an issue, must resolve it by finding out what the Communist Party position is and then endorsing its opposite, whether or not that opposite seems to have any intrinsic merit.

Even this may not be quite enough. The Communist Party line is subject to sudden and drastic changes—or, at least, so we have often been told. The Board, in applying the similar non-deviation test of section 13(e)(2), found that parallel statements by Russian and American Communists were equally significant to show domination of the latter by the former, regardless of which came first in point of time. It seems, therefore, that even after the prudent organization has established with reasonable certainty that a proposed policy is not now the Communist position, it still may not be a safe policy to espouse—the Communists might endorse it later.

What this boils down to, as a practical matter, is that the prudent organization will take no position on any controversial issue which might offend the powerful, and the prudent individual will neither join or contribute to any.

organization which has ever taken such a position or which might conceivably do so in the future. Thus the Act, as Professor Chafee has pointed out (63 Harv. L. Rev. 1382, 1384), interferes "by law with freedom of discussion through organizations" and "proposes to twist out of all recognizable shape one of the leading traditions of American life: the possibility of freely forming associations for all sorts of purposes—religious, political, social and economic."

We realize that it may be argued that some of these questions are premature in the present proceeding, since the petitioner in this case, the Communist Party, is not charged with being a "Communist-front," nor does it, we assume, deny that it is in some sense of the term, a "Communist organization." We submit, however, that the Act's validity must be decided in the light of its total impact on American freedom. That total impact is not limited by the details of this, or any particular, proceeding. Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88, 97. It is defined rather by the scope of the potential danger arising from the Act which an organization must assess before espousing any policy and which an individual must assess before venturing to join an organization. This total impact can be determined only by examining the pattern of the Act as a whole.

Such an examination is also appropriate in this proceeding for other reasons:

First: The primary impact of the Act is not on the Communist Party, but on mixed organizations including non-Communist members.

This fact is evident from the structure of the Act itself. The Board is created and staffed as a permanent organization; yet it can try the Communist Party only once and then devote the rest of its existence to other organizations. It is plain, also, that the trial of the Communist Party can only come first. The definitions of the Act are such, Sections 3(4) and 3(4A), that no organization can well be-accused of being a "front" or of being "infiltrated," unless the Communist Party has first been tried and condemned. The Attorney General has so construed them in action by deferring his first group of front petitions until a few days after the Board issued its order in the present case.

It is also evident from the Act's setting, both legal and practical. If the findings of Section 2 are assumed to be correct, no new legislation was necessary to impose registration requirements on the Communist Party—it was already subject to registration requirements under both the Voorhis Act, 18 U. S. C. 2386, and the McCormack Act, 22 U. S. C. 611 et seq. Furthermore, Congress has rendered the Board's trial of the Communist Party perfunctory in advance by deciding that "the Communist organization in the United States," which could only refer to the Communist Party, constitutes "a clear and present danger." Sec. 2(15) (emphasis added). It has been rendered even more perfunctory in retrospect by Section 4 of the Communist Control Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 775 et seq., which specifically identifies the Communist Party as a Communist-action organization.

Moreover, the Board is not likely to have the independence required for judicial decision. In Collier's magazine for September 2, 1955, Hon. Harry P. Cain, a member of the Board, is quoted as saying that the President's secretary told him "This is a team and you're expected to play on it", and a high official of the Justice Department is quoted as saying that former Senator Cain should have resigned from the Board before criticizing the Justice Department. Whether or not these quotations are accurate it seems evident that the Board is more subject to political and public pressure than is a court of law.

All of this taken together makes it very plain that the primary function of the Act under review, in law as well as in fact, is not to subject the petitioner to sanctions, but to serve as a foundation for charges brought against other organizations.

Second: The primary impact of the Act is on organizations a substantial number of whose members are neither Communists nor Communist sympathizers.

Conceivably, the term, "Communist-front," might be applied to an organization made up entirely of Communists, but which does not proclaim that to be the fact. The Act makes it evident that this is not what Congress had in mind. Section 13(f) does not require or provide for proof that a majority, or even a substantial minority of the members are Communists. The findings in Section 2(7) speak of "fronts" as being "created and maintained, or used, in such manner as to conceal the facts as to their true character and purposes and their membership," and asserts that they are able to obtain "support from persons who would not extend such support if they knew the true purposes * * *." It is evident that what Congress is concerned about here is that organizations under some degree of Communist influence are able to attract and to retain as members a substantial number of persons who are neither Communists nor Communist sympathizers. The further assumption seems to be that Communists are such super-men and non-Communists such weaklings that the thinking and point of view of the Communists, even if they be in a minority, will prevail and dominate the policies and actions of the organization. This is not only guilt by association in crassest form—it is pernicious nonsense.

In the case of "Communist-infiltrated" organizations, the very name implies that the membership is chiefly non-Communist.

Third: The primary impact of the Act on a mixed organization is not on the Communist members, but on the non-Communist members.

This fact, we think, is plainly evident. The citation of a mixed organization before the Board can mean little or nothing to the Communist members, as individuals. It threatens them with no penalty to which they are not already subject. By contrast, its impact on the non-Communist members is enormous. It threatens them with being transformed, at a single stroke, from first class citizens into persons classified inferentially as spies by their automatic ineligibility for a passport, and as saboteurs by their blank proscription from government, labor union or defense industry employment.

Fourth: The inhibitory effect of the Act on freedom of expression operates primarily not on insurrectionary ideas, but on non-insurrectionary ideas.

This, we think, is also very plain. When this Act was proposed, the expression of insurrectionary ideas was already fully and exhaustively dealt with in the Smith Act, 18 U. S. C. 2385, and by the concept of conspiracy to violate the Smith Act. Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494. Obviously, therefore, it represents a Congressional judgment that activities which the Smith Act failed to reach should also be brought under control. This could only be the expression of ideas condemned not because of their insurrectionary nature, which would bring them within the purview of the Smith Act, but simply because they have Communist support.

Taking all these factors into consideration, we think it very evident that the validity of the Act should be determined in this proceeding not by its impact on the petitioner, but by its impact on American civil liberties. Thornhill v. Alabama, supra; Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U. S. 444, 451, 453. If the Act fails for this reason, then it becomes immaterial whether Congress could validly have reached some activities of petitioner under a more narrowly drawn statute. Reese v. United States, 92 U. S. 214; James v. Bowman, 190 U. S. 127; Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507.

Taking the impact of the Act as a whole, it is clear that its vagueness and breadth make it invalid by bringing within the scope of its repressive effect much constitutionally protected conduct. Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359;

Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242; Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507.

It is a statute in which vague and fluid words set a trap for the innocent. United States v. Cardiff, 344 U. S. 174, 176-7. It exacts "obedience to a rule or standard . . . so vague and indefinite as really to be no rule or standard at all." Small v. American Sugar Refining Co., 267 U. S. 233, 239. It is a prime example of that type of statute concerning which it has been well said that:

> Definiteness is designedly avoided so as to allow the net to be cast at large, to enable men to be caught who are vaguely undesirable in the eyes of police and prosecution, although not chargeable with any particular offense. Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507, 540 (Frankfurter, J. dissenting).

It acts as an overhanging threat to, and therefore as a prior restraint of, the free dissemination of ideas. Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88, 101-102; Follett v. McCormick, 321 U. S. 573, 575; Cantwell v. Conn., 310 U. S. 296, 306.

It authorizes a Board of five men to sit in judgment on organizations, to determine that some are deserving and others are not, to permit deserving organizations free access to the market place of ideas, to deny access, except at the price of crippling restraints, to those deemed non-deserving. It is thus, in the substance although not in form, a statute which provides for the licensing of expressions of opinion and which confers broad discretion on the licensing officials. Such statutes are invalid on their face. Schneider v. State, 308 U. S. 147; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296; Largent v. Texas, 318 U. S. 418.

II. The Act is unconstitutional because it rests on findings which are beyond congressional power.

A. It is beyond congressional power to declare that the dissemination of non-dangerous ideas should be repressed because the disseminators are connected with a dangerous movement.

Congress, understandably dubious of its power to enact the statute, has attempted to bolster that power by reciting that: "The Communist organization in the United States, pursuing its stated objectives, the recent successes of Communist methods in other countries, and the nature and control of the world Communist movement itself, present a clear and present danger * * *."

Congress, we submit, has no such authority. The existence of a clear and present danger which would, under the decisions of this Court, justify an abridgment of freedom of expression has been recently ruled to be a question of law, to be decided by a court. Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494. Congress, of course, can make law within the limits of its legislative authority. It cannot decide questions of law, arising out of particular facts, in such a way as to make its decision binding on a court.

Furthermore, Congress cannot lift itself by its own boot straps; it cannot legislate its own powers. Consequently, when the constitutional validity of a statute abridging personal and political freedoms depends on a finding, it necessarily follows that that finding, whether of fact or law, cannot be made by the Congress. Cf. West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624, 638, 640; Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, 529-30; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88, 96; Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242, 258.

The opposite result would virtually destroy our device of a written constitution and substitute legislative supremacy. If Congress can render an invalid statute valid by reciting that it finds the facts to be such as would render it necessary, then nullification of First Amendment guarantees, and of any or all constitutional guarantees, is no more than a drafting problem.

If Congress can do what it has done here, it could also "investigate" the "Protocols of Zion," draft an appropriate set of findings, and proceed to restore all the civil disabilities to which Jews were once subject. See Wormuth, Legislative Qualifications as Bills of Attainder, 4 Vanderbilt Law Rev. 603, 616. As a matter of fact, in an atmosphere of anti-Semitic excitement, comparable to the atmosphere of anti-Communist excitement which prevailed in 1950 when this Act was passed, it is easily conceivable that such findings might be rendered. It is also easily conceivable that they might be supported by substantial evidence in the investigative record, since in such an atmosphere there would always be witnesses willing, for self-interest or even for a flattering spotlight, to cater to and inflame the current passion.

The position of the court below that Congressional findings are conclusive when they deal with a matter within the general scope of Congressional power, and are rendered after "extensive investigation" (Op. pp. 55-6), is untenable for several other reasons. Cf. Chastleton Corp. v. Sinclair, 264 U. S. 543.

The findings of Section 2 deal principally with the nature and historic significance of the "world Communist movement," with the nature of the governments of foreign countries in which that movement has come to power, and with the intentions of those governments toward the governments of non-Communist countries including our own. The conclusion is that we cannot co-exist with those of our own citizens who are Communists, yet this conclusion is little more than an inference derived from the almost explicit assumption that we cannot co-exist with "the Communist dictatorship of a foreign country," in which "the direction and control of the world Communist movement is vested . . . ." These findings thus have their roots in judgments in the field of international relations. This is a field which the Constitution entrusts almost entirely to the executive branch of the government. It is interesting to note that the executive branch has recently come to the conclusion that co-existence with Communist countries is possible and desirable and that it is now in process of being sought—conclusions which contradict the most basic assumptions and attitudes from which the findings of Section 2 were reached.

The findings of Section 2 deal with complex and emotionally surcharged relationships between people and between institutions and movements composed of people. If an evaluation and interpretation of such relationships can be said to be a "fact" at all, it is at most a very relative, conditional and unstable fact. Developments of the last few months indicate that these relationships are beginning to undergo a profound change. For this reason alone, the position of the Court of Appeals that it is legally bound to assume that the fears expressed by Congress in 1950 provide an adequate, complete and conclusive picture of current reality, is unreasonable, if not wholly irrational. Cf. Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 581 (Black, J., dissenting); see Chastleton Corp. v. Sinclair, 264 U. S. 543, 547-8.

The finding, in any case, is not a constitutional clear and present danger finding. The constitutional test has always been whether the particular statements which are being suppressed give rise to a clear and present danger of substantive evils which Congress has a right to prevent. Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47. It is a vastly and fundamentally different thing to say that expressions of opinion which have no inherent tendency to bring about any evil can be suppressed because of the dangerous character of the speaker, or even because of the speaker's affiliation with a dangerous movement. Despite the use of the phrase "clear and present danger", this goes back to, and even beyond, the old "bad tendency" test. Even the discredited "bad tendency" test at least purported to find the tendency in the speech, not in the speaker's political dossier.

It is not the law that the peaceful advocacy of lawful change can be suppressed or penalized because of the participation, influence or sponsorship of revolutionists. De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353.

B. It is beyond congressional power to find that a specified group, association or movement, whether identified by name or by description, is engaging in proscribed activity.

The findings included in Section 2 include a "purpose" to use treachery, deceit, infiltration, espionage, sabotage and terrorism. Subdiv. (1). The Board purports, in this proceeding, to have conducted an impartial trial of the question whether American Communists are foreign agents, yet the trial is held under an Act in which Congress instructs the Board at considerable length about the relations between American Communists and the world Communist movement. Subdivs. 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 12. It is found in subdiv. (6) that American Communists are endeavoring to overthrow the government by force and in subdiv. (9) that they have repudiated their allegiance to this country. In subdiv. (11) Congress reveals that Communists are engaged in committing espionage and sabotage so cleverly that the government is unable to prove it.

These are findings of guilt and, to a considerable extent, of criminal guilt. They amount to verdicts, rendered against each and every member of the Communist Party, finding them each guilty of a considerable variety of serious felonies, including Smith Act violations and conspiracies to incite rebellion or insurrection, to overthrow the government by force, to commit espionage, to commit sabotage. They are also, in effect, findings that the leaders of the Communist Party are criminally liable for failure to register it under the Voorhis and McCormack Acts, supra, although the government has had ample opportunity to indict them on such a charge and has never seen fit to do so.

The power to render findings of personal guilt is one so delicate, so easily subject to abuse, that the framers of our Bill of Rights devised for it a whole interlocking system of limitations and safeguards. Among these are the sifting of accusations by grand juries in order to protect the accused from the injury of unsubstantiated charges, the right to know the nature and cause of the accusation, to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses, to subpoena and present defense witnesses, to be tried by jury, to be heard by counsel in his own defense before the verdict is rendered. All these laboriously constructed safeguards are automatically swept aside when Congress conducts the trial and renders the verdict in the form of "findings" attached to an enactment.

We think that the basic reasons why bills of attainder are constitutionally prohibited is that the legislative process does not permit of adequate guarantees that such questions will be decided justly. We also think that Section 2 of the Act is in substance a gigantic bill of attainder in which thousands of individuals have been simultaneously adjudged guilty of serious offenses. United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303; Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333.

The fact that the verdict is rendered against all members of a group, instead of against named individuals, does not render the finding more legislative in character. Rather, it shows that Congress has undertaken to convict not only those individuals against whom it has heard evidence, but also many thousands of others concerning whom, as individuals, no evidence whatsoever was produced. This merely complicates the abuses which the framers of the Constitution feared in legislative trials by adding to them a still further abuse.

The purely verbal trick of substituting "the Communist movement in the United States" and "the Communist organization in the United States" for the name, "Communist Party of the United States," is a disguise so paper-thin that it would be unworthy of comment but for the fact that it shows Congress' awareness that it was attempting, in Section 2, something which would be held unconstitutional if done too openly. It is otherwise without significance. The great constitutional guarantees deal with substance, not form.

It is true that, if we are right in our view that there is a fundamental constitutional principle that questions of guilt must be decided by the judicial process, then this Court's decision in American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U. S. 382, must be regarded as a departure from that principle. Yet even that case, which we think the Court will ultimately find it necessary to reconsider, is very far from providing any precedent for the upholding of the present Act. On the contrary, that case is specifically limited to situations where the penal effect on the individuals involved is slight, the number of individuals affected is small, and all of them are regarded as occupying strategic positions from which they can affect the flow of commerce. It was only because of those limitations that the Act there under consideration was upheld. In this case, as we have attempted to demonstrate under Point I, the penal effect is extremely severe, the number of individuals affected is enormous, and they are affected despite the fact that they may occupy positions of very minor importance, or none at all. Also, Section 2 of this Act undertakes to find its myriad defendants guilty of much more serious offenses than a tendency to indulge in political strikes. Even the Douds case, far from justifying the present Act, contains many indications by way of dicta that what has been here attempted would be invalid.

C. It is beyond congressional power to evaluate political movements, pronounce them safe or dangerous, or to decide the relative merits of alternative forms of government.

With its findings of guilt Section 2 mingles political interpretations and evaluations. It deals with the "purpose" and "nature" of the Communist movement. It pronounces on the desirability of Communism as a system of government. Subdivs. (2) and (3). It pronounces Communism as a political movement or tendency to be a dangerous aberration, which the government, subdiv. (15), must undertake to frustrate. It rules that Communist organizations, although they may "designate themselves as political parties," are "in fact" not political parties. Subdiv. (6).

Even those who wholeheartedly agree with all the political judgments embodied in Section 2 should recognize that a body competent to reach them, not as personal opinions but with official finality, must necessarily be equally competent to determine, if it should ever be so inclined, that the Democratic Party should be suppressed because it is "in fact" a plot to bankrupt the country and disrupt the national economy, or the Republican Party because it is "in fact" nothing but a subservient tool of private corporate greed.

We submit that the First Amendment was adopted precisely to prevent governmental findings on such questions. Indeed, in the field of political liberty, the First Amendment could serve no other practical purpose. No constitutional limitations are needed to prevent governments from suppressing views which those in power do not consider dangerous and unwholesome.

It is not the function of the Congress to decide whether a form of government is good or bad, whether a political movement is a danger or a promise, whether a political theory is true or false. It is not its function to decide that persons who "designate themselves as political parties" should be denied the right to offer, endorse and oppose candidates, publish political platforms, support and oppose legislation, etc., because Congress disbelieves their political representations.

These are not questions of fact but questions of political evaluation. Their decision is an exercise, not of the delegated powers committed to a representative government, but of the ultimate powers reserved to a self-governing people. The power of determining such questions is withheld from the Congress by the First Amendment and reserved to the people by the Ninth and Tenth.

D. The findings are not severable.

The opinions which Congress has expressed in Section 2 constitute the foundation on which the Act's whole structure is erected. The definitions in Section 3 of "Communist-action", "Communist-front", and "Communist-infiltrated" organizations are expressed in terms of the findings. Without the definitions and the findings on which they rest, the remainder of the "Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950," as amended, has nothing on which to operate.

Hence, in this instance, despite the presence of a severability clause, the fact that the findings are beyond Congressional power necessarily invalidates the Act as a whole.

III. The Act is unconstitutional because it authorizes ideological trials and penalizes beliefs, opinions and attitudes, not evidenced by overt acts.

A. The Act authorizes ideological trials.

The danger of any insurrectionary activity, we learn from Section 2 (15), is dependent on certain conditions precedent. There must first arise "a moment when the United States may be so far extended by foreign engagements, so far divided in counsel, or so far in industrial or financial straits, that overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence may seem possible of achievement * * *." These, obviously, are remote, and entirely hypothetical circumstances, which may never arise at all. Yet without them, not even an unsuccessful insurrectionary attempt is predicted. For the present and the predictable future, "the Communist movement * * * seeks converts * * * by * * * schooling and indoctrination."

It is also interesting to note that Congress has not thought it necessary to require that condemned organizations report on whether they possess arms, ammunition or explosives, nor even on their resources in the way of short-wave apparatus, cloaks, daggers and supplies of invisible ink. It has, however, required:

> "A listing, in such form and detail as the Attorney General shall by regulation prescribe, of all printing presses and machines including but not limited to rotary presses, flatbed cylinder presses, platen presses, lithographs, offsets, photo-offsets, mimeograph machines, multigraph machines, duplicating machines, ditto machines, linotype machines, intertype machines, monotype machines, and all other types of printing presses, typesetting machines or any mechanical devices used or intended to be used, or capable of being used to produce or publish printed matter or material, which are in the possession, custody, ownership, or control of the Communist-action or Communist-front organization or its officers, members, affiliates, associates, group, or groups in which the Communist-action or Communist-front organization, its officers or members have an interest." Sec. 7 (d) (6).

This section, although not part of the original Act but added by a later amendment, may be said to speak for itself as a Congressional construction of the nature of the "clear and present danger."

The Act's instructions to the Board as to the matters it shall "take into consideration" set the stage for an ideological trial by their heavy stress on parallelism in views and policies and on the subjective state of mind to be attributed to members or leaders of the accused organizations. This stress is matched by the Act's complete failure to require proof of any objective facts adequate to the determination of issues to which grave legal consequences have been attached.

Space does not permit a detailed analysis of the Board's voluminous report, yet we nevertheless submit that a close and critical analysis of that document, in particular its processes of inference, will make it clear that the abuses which the Act so obviously invites have in fact occurred.

A glance at the report is sufficient to make clear that references to historical works on Communist theory written by Europeans since deceased are enormously more numerous and have much greater bearing on the Board's conclusions than references to overt conduct found to have been engaged in by petitioner. By this method of reasoning the Board would be competent, if it should ever be so inclined, to proscribe the Democratic Party on the basis that Jefferson and Madison advocated revolution under certain conditions or the Republican Party on the basis of similar statements of Lincoln and Grant. See footnote to Opinion of Justice Jackson in American Communications Association v. Douds (supra), p. 440. On closer examination of the reasoning process, it becomes evident that the Board has not looked to petitioner's conduct as a test of what it really believes. On the contrary, it has started by attributing its own version of the theory to petitioner and then used this as a basis for inferring the significance and motivation of petitioner's conduct. Compare Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, 158-9. For example, when it wishes to know whether the Communist Party, despite its denials, intends to undertake violent revolution in the United States, the Board does not inquire whether the matter can be tested objectively, for example, by inquiring whether overt preparations for such an undertaking, such as military drills and the accumulation of secret arms caches, have taken place. Instead, it looks to see what Lenin said about it.

In short, the Board has not tried the Communist Party. It has tried and condemned "Marxism-Leninism".

This process reaches its grotesque climax in the Board's finding that "Marxism-Leninism * * * has been promulgated and issued by the Soviet Union as the overall philosophy, authoritative rules, directives and instructions governing the world Communist movement" (p. 78) and that "the Marxist-Leninist classics are one of the chief means by which the Communist Party of the Soviet Union directs, dominates, and controls the Communist Party of the United States" (p. 43).

Thus, according to the Board's theory, if an American reads the "Communist Manifesto," a work written in England by German refugees more than half a century before the Russian revolution, and if he finds it convincing and adopts its ideas as his own, he thereby becomes ipso facto a Russian agent and falls under the sway of Russian Communist leaders who are "controlling and dominating" him through the medium of the book. This is witch-hunting at its weirdest.

B. The Act penalizes beliefs

Under Point I we have discussed the sanctions of the Act and what is said there need not be repeated. At this point, we wish merely to take note that some, at least, of these sanctions permit of only two interpretations. Either they are penalties imposed for the mere holding of a belief or they are conclusive presumptions, drawn from the mere fact of belief, that the individual involved is disposed to commit offenses which he is not shown ever to have committed.

For example, the Act subjects any member of an organization ordered to register to a penalty of $10,000 fine and five years imprisonment, Sec. 15 (c), for the offense of applying for, using or attempting to use a passport. Sec. 6(a). No showing is required that the passport was used or intended for any improper purpose. Unless the intention is purely punitive, it must embody an implied Congressional judgment that all members of the Communist Party and all members of all "Communist-front" organizations are unfit to be trusted with passports. The Act contains nothing to explain or illuminate such a judgment, except the statement in Section 2 (8) that "travel of Communist members, representatives, and agents from country to country facilitates communication and is a prerequisite for the carrying on of activities to further the purposes of the Communist movement."

Yet the Act does not require a scintilla of proof that the individual denied a passport has ever served as an international courier or evinced any willingness to do so. It makes no provision for the consideration of affirmative proof as to why he needs to go abroad or what he intends to do. It does not permit the issuing officer to find that any combination of facts whatever outweigh the bare fact of an organizational membership. Indeed, it makes the officer guilty of a crime if he issues the passport with knowledge or "reason to believe" that the applicant is a member. If the right to a passport has in fact been cut off, not to punish the individual, but because of a supposed probability that he will serve as an international courier, then that probability has been conclusively presumed from the individual's supposed beliefs, attitudes and loyalties. Even the latter are inferred from the bare fact of membership and, in the case of a non-Communist member of a "front," from the bare fact of association. It will be a brave official indeed who will not resolve every doubt against an applicant.

Similarly, the Act conclusively presumes unfitness for government employment without proof of any disloyal act and for labor union employment without proof of any participation in a political strike.

Let us suppose the case of a skilled worker who has been in a defense industry for twenty years and for all that time has been a trusted and satisfactory employee. No job he worked on has ever been sabotaged. Now it develops that he must be banned from his present job, and from all defense industry, because of membership in an organization. Is this because he might commit sabotage? If so, why is the line of reasoning from his membership to his beliefs to his probable future conduct—an inference on an inference, winding up with a prediction—so compelling that his contrary record on the specific issue cannot even be taken into consideration?

The pretense that we are not punishing the heretic for his opinions, but are only guarding against the misconduct which his opinions might lead him to commit, is the most ancient and threadbare rationalization of persecution. It is the very hallmark of bigotry. It was used for centuries by Catholics to justify the imposition of disabilities on Protestants. Protestants, when they came to power, imposed similar disabilities on Catholics and offered the same excuse. Both used it to defend and explain discrimination against the Jews. Why should such a hoary pretext for intolerance rise to haunt the United States in mid-Twentieth Century?

> "It is altogether impossible to reason from the opinions which a man professes to his feelings and his actions; and in fact no person is ever such a fool as to reason thus, except when he wants a pretext for persecuting his neighbors" (Historical Essays, London, 1932, p. 92).
> "If such arguments are to pass current, it will be easy to prove that there was never such a thing as religious persecution since the creation. For there never was a religious persecution in which some odious crime was not, justly or unjustly, said to be obviously deducible from the doctrines of the persecuted party . . .

The true distinction is perfectly obvious. To punish a man because he has committed a crime, or because he is believed, though unjustly, to have committed a crime, is not persecution. To punish a man, because we infer from the nature of some doctrine which he holds, or from the conduct of other persons who hold the same doctrines with him, that he will commit a crime, is persecution, and is, in every case, wicked and foolish" (Ibid, pp. 7-8). (Emphasis supplied.)

IV. There is now no clear and present danger which would justify such an invasion of rights protected by the First Amendment as the Act under review makes.

This Court in upholding the Smith Act in United States v. Dennis (supra) weighed the probable danger to our national security from the Communist conspiracy, which had been found by the court below to exist, against the danger from the invasion of free speech and association and upheld the Smith Act as applied in that case on the probability of danger from the conspiracy to advocate the overthrow of government being greater than the danger from the curtailment of the protection of the First Amendment. Chief Justice Vinson said:

> "Chief Judge Learned Hand, writing for the majority of the Court below, interpreted the phrase (clear and present danger) as follows: 'In each case (courts) must ask whether the gravity of the "evil", discounted by the improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger.' 183 F. 2d at 212. We adopt this statement of the rule."

The restrictions of the Act were upheld on the ground of clear and present danger. This was a matter to be decided by the courts, not Congress. Since Dennis was decided and since the Act under review here was passed by Congress, conditions in the world have radically changed. The decision was clearly based on the belief that we were threatened by war with a powerful Communist bloc, headed by the Soviet Union, and that there were ties between the leaders of the world Communist movement and the leaders of the American Communist Party which created a danger to our national security. See pp. 511, 547, 563, 589. Happily the danger of international conflict is receding. In his final statement at the close of the recent Geneva conference, President Eisenhower said:

> "If our peoples in the months and years ahead broaden their knowledge and their understanding of each other as we, during this week have broadened our knowledge of each other, further agreements between our governments may be facilitated * * *. I came here (to Geneva) because I believe mankind longs for freedom from war and rumors of war. I came here because of my lasting faith in the decent instincts and good sense of the people who populate this world of ours. I shall return home with these convictions unshaken and with the prayer that the hope of mankind will one day be realized." (New York Times, July 25, 1955.)

Time and again during and since the Geneva conference the President has expressed his faith that the leaders of the Soviet Union as well as its people sincerely desire peace. In Geneva he said: "There is evidence of a new friendliness in the world." (New York Times, July 27, 1955.)

It is true, as the President indicated in his address to the American Bar Association on August 24, 1955, that Geneva has not settled grave specific issues. It is equally true, however, as the President said, that "Geneva spells for America not stagnation but opportunity. Opportunity for our own people and for people everywhere to realize their just aspirations."

On the same occasion Chief Justice Warren truly said:

> "We, and other free countries, are endeavoring to demonstrate that freedom and dignity for all constitute the only sound basis for world peace. In such a gigantic struggle where the eyes of a critical world are constantly on everyone, the power of example is far more forceful than that of precept."

An article in the New York Times for August 7, 1955 written in Moscow under the by-line of Harry Schwartz headed "Signs of Eclipse of Molotov Noted" says that Soviet Foreign Minister "may have suffered a sharp eclipse in power and prestige along with the eclipse of the 'hard foreign' policy he laid down only six months ago . . . Last week, Premier Nikolai Bulganin uttered only soothing words, words of peace and good will, words echoed by lesser figures in the supreme Soviet debate that followed his speech."

In the same edition of The Times appeared an article headed "U. S., Soviet Closer on Atom Security" which quoted a United States official as saying:

> "Once you accept these basic principles there is only one way your policy can be directed. You have to try to figure out some means whereby you and the other fellow can live in the same world together. Otherwise you die together."

The article went on to say:

> "Moreover, another vital conclusion has been drawn —one that thus far seems at least partly to be accepted by Moscow. If the great powers are not going to defeat each other or destroy each other by nuclear attacks then they must learn how to live with each other and with their differences.
> This means that diplomacy assumes a new importance. Negotiators must sharpen their skills to try to ease tensions."

These are but a few of the indications filling the press of the world indicating that we are entering a new era of peaceful co-existence. But while the world moves the statute under review remains frozen in an earlier concept. If the new era is to be brought in it needs the popular support which the Act stifles.

In his address to the American Bar Association on August 24, 1955, President Eisenhower said that our program must be "dynamic and flexible" and the goals we seek could never have been achieved "when men and nations confronted each other with hearts filled with fear and hatred" (New York Times, Aug. 25, 1955). Thus, the head of the Executive branch of our Government takes a position in 1955 which negates the findings of Congress in 1950 as expressed in Sec. 2 of the Act, which are based on fear, not faith; hatred, not amity.

Will President Eisenhower be denied a passport or required to register under the Act? Of course not. Senator Ellender was quoted in the New York Times for August 25, 1955 as saying in Moscow that if people who oppose friendly visits to the Soviet Union "came here they might see things in a different light." Will he and other members of Congress become victims themselves of the gag law they passed? One evil of the law is that it is bound, in practice, to be discriminatory.

Another evil in writing alleged findings of fact into law is that there is an assumption that history is static. The law remains on the books to plague us long after the concepts on which it is based have been outmoded by passing events. Who in Congress could have predicted when the Act was passed how vastly changed the world atmosphere would be before its constitutionality could be passed on by this Court?

An article in The Nation for August 20, 1955 says:

> "The Geneva Conference was born in January 1954 when it was decided at NATO headquarters in Paris that a future war should be fought with atomic weapons. It is almost a gift from Heaven that in this crucial time a man like General Eisenhower, with his military knowledge coupled with a deep humanitarianism and a sense of responsibility, is the President of the United States. Thanks to Geneva he has become a symbol of peace and the hope of peoples everywhere."

Even more significant of the changed conditions than the friendly utterances of statesmen are the exchanges of information on hitherto carefully guarded atomic secrets by the scientists in the recent meeting in Geneva and the invitation to the scientists of the Soviet Union to visit the principal atomic energy plant in Great Britain and to make a complete inspection. It is inconceivable that the curtain of secrecy which has been so closely drawn over the area of nuclear energy could have been lifted had not the responsible heads of the Western governments, including our own, reached conclusions as to the danger of war which are at complete variance with the premises of the Act.

In a dispatch to the New York Times of August 20, 1955, from Geneva, Michael J. Hoffman says of the role of Americans at the Conference of Scientists:

> "It is impossible, American representatives here believe, that the demonstration of good faith and scientific leadership should not redound to the political advantage of the United States in the broadest sense of the term."

In an article on disarmament in the New York Times for August 21, 1955, Harrison E. Salisbury writes:

> "The questions the United States poses—questions of mutual survival in a nuclear world—are a measure of the metamorphosis in Washington's thinking on the subject.
>
> "Evidence of these changes has multiplied rapidly in recent weeks. Actually, the roots go back to the appointment of Mr. Stassen in March."

And on the same date the New York Times said editorially under the caption "An Atomic Milestone":

> "The first International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy has ended in Geneva in what is universally acclaimed as a resounding success that made it a new milestone in the atomic age. Bringing together the leading atomic scientists from seventy-two nations, including in particular Soviet Russia, it not only rose above all political and ideological boundaries but also lifted a good part of the secrecy surrounding the new forces modern man has unleashed and turned the world's attention from their destructive potentialities to their constructive possibilities."

Also significant is the increasing flow of observers in both directions including the visits of farmers from the Soviet Union to this country and of American farmers to the Soviet Union.

In Chastleton Corp. v. Sinclair (supra), it was held that a law depending upon the existence of an emergency or other state of facts to uphold it may cease to operate if the emergency ceases or the facts change. The facts have changed since the Act was passed.

We believe that this Court has the opportunity and duty to make a contribution of utmost value to this new movement for better understanding by striking down this Act which is based on fear and false concepts of security. The Court can and should review the findings of fact on which clear and present danger was predicated in Dennis which, in the opinion of the Court, justified curtailment of First Amendment rights. If the danger has receded and if, as we believe, the current danger is not from attack from without but from the eroding of our liberties from within, the Act is clearly lacking in constitutional sanctions and is itself a clear and present danger to our historic freedoms and institutions, and should be struck down. Many of the most prominent leaders in our country, clergymen, rabbis, educators, editors, and jurists, including members of this Court have voiced alarm that freedom of speech and association are threatened as never before in our history. At least three Justices of this Court, Chief Justice Warren,[1] Mr. Justice Douglas[2] and the late Mr. Justice Jackson[3] have expressed their concern over the situation in widely reported public addresses.

While the tide of repression in the name of combating Communism has mounted, the Communist stream of propaganda itself has dwindled. Yet the menace attributed to Communism has created a danger for every American who does not toe the orthodox line. As this is written a Congressional Committee is conducting an investigation into the entertainment industry and asking actors about their political beliefs as if there could be something subversive in speaking or listening to the lines of a play if spoken by the lips of a heretic. This is merely one straw in a vast gale of censorship, public and private, in which individual liberties are being blown away.

We believe that Judge Learned Hand, who wrote the opinion of the Court of Appeals in United States v. Dennis, 183 Fed. 2nd 201, was aware of the changed atmosphere of this day from that in which he wrote that opinion, when he said in a speech at the University of New York on October 24, 1952:

> "Risk for risk, for myself I had rather take my chance that some traitors will escape detection than spread abroad a spirit of general suspicion and distrust, which accepts rumor and gossip in place of undismayed and unintimidated inquiry. I believe that that community is already in process of dissolution where each man begins to eye his neighbor as a possible enemy, where non-conformity with the accepted creed, political as well as religious, is a mark of disaffection; where denunciation, without specification or backing, takes the place of evidence; where orthodoxy chokes freedom of dissent; where faith in the eventual supremacy of reason has become so timid that we dare not enter our convictions in the open lists, win or lose. Such fears as these are a solvent which can eat out the cement that binds the stones together; they may in the end subject us to a despotism as evil as any that we dread • • • who knows but we may be on a slope which leads down to aboriginal savagery." (Emphasis supplied.)

Here, indeed, is a clear and present danger expressed by some of our greatest jurists which, weighed in the balance of probabilities against the danger found in Dennis v. United States (supra), may well demand the immediate strengthening by the courts of First Amendment protections.

To avoid burdening the Court with what it already knows about the honest fears of honest men that our traditional liberties are threatened, we confine ourselves to a few quotations from among the hundreds that have appeared in recent months.

In his report as President of the Fund for the Republic (N. Y. Times Aug. 22, 1955) Dr. Robert M. Hutchins declared:

> "The misunderstanding of civil liberties, the indifference to them, and the violations of them, to which we too easily grow accustomed, are still such as to cause alarm," noting that a political party had been identified with the "enemy", Dr. Hutchins added that "it has appeared that the peril to the country could be dealt with only by methods that drastically departed from those that have characterized Anglo-American jurisprudence."

Among other important statements are the following:

> "Under the plea that the structure of American society is in imminent peril of being shattered by a satanic conspiracy, dangerous developments are taking place today in our national life. Favored by an atmosphere of intense disquiet and suspicion, a subtle but potent assault upon basic human rights is now in progress." (Emphasis supplied.) From statement of General Council of the Presbytrian Church in the United States of America reported New York Times, November 3, 1953.

> "This incident (the examination of Bishop Oxnam by a Congressional Committee) is indicative of a trend in our American life that threatens the security of our institutions and causes us to fear for the future of our long, established liberties." (Emphasis supplied.) From statement of Council of Bishops of the Methodist Church adopted at the annual meeting in Omaha, Neb. Apr. 30, 1953, and reported in The Churchman for June 1953.

"If it is important to detect a conspiratorial Communist who wears the robes of a clergyman, it is equally important not to confuse a 'liberal Christian' or honest advocate of social reform with Communists. This is something which is now happening to an alarming degree." From National Council Outlook, official journal of the National Council of Churches, in its issue of May 1953.

"In the midst of this roaring wilderness of political atavism, where the very air is filled with bombast, menace and threat, there has been a dismaying silence on the part of political figures whom Americans have always regarded as bold and passionate defenders of traditional American liberties and rights. This ignominious silence is itself a measure of the abyss into which we have plunged." (Emphasis supplied.) From Congress Weekly, published in New York by the American Jewish Congress, editorial in issue of May 11, 1953.

"A more basic threat has been a growing tendency on the part of our people and their representatives in government to suppose that it is within the competence of the State to determine what is and what is not American." From statement by General Board of the National Council of Churches of Christ in America, reported in The New York Times, p. 20, Mar. 18, 1954.

Such quotations from high sources could be multiplied. The concept has been growing that the threats contained in the Smith Act extend to all sorts of organizations and to other ideas than the advocacy of force and violence. The Act under review confirms the fear. Persons advocating ideas for social reform or even peace advocates are to be subjected to or threatened by repressive action. Clearly the emphasis since the decision in Dennis has shifted and the weighing of probabilities of danger needs to be undertaken by the Court anew.

The opinion of the Court below in dealing with the right of an individual in a proscribed organization to withdraw or to seek Court review overlooks the basic error of the Statute. An individual has a Constitutional right to belong to an organization "infiltrated" with Communists. He should not be required to find out whether this is or is not a fact. He should not be required to withdraw or submit to penalties even if it should be determined by procedural due process that such is the fact. The test should be whether the organization has engaged in punishable activity. The test of the Act is association. It makes the Communist a political leper with whom non-Communists cannot work for the cause of peace or any other cause no matter how worthy. As the Court below correctly states "The critical questions concerning a so-called 'outlawry' statute are whether the matter prohibited is eligible for prohibition" but denying rights of association for constitutionally protected activities is ineligible for prohibition.

In the opinion of most Americans one of the most weakening and repugnant features of the Soviet Union has been what Sidney and Beatrice Webb called "the disease of Orthodoxy." The Act under review is an attempt to inject this virus into our American System in virulent form. Only this honorable Court can provide the antidote. It can help to restore our reputation in the world as the stronghold of liberty and our rights of freedom of speech and association at home by declaring the Act void.

CONCLUSION

We submit that the Subversive Activities Control Act should be held unconstitutional on its face. It follows that the decision below should be reversed.

APPENDIX B

August 18, 1955

Hon. Simon E. Sobeloff
Solicitor General of the United States
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:

COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES vs.
SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD No. 48
October Term, 1955

In accordance with Rule 42 of the Revised Rules of the Supreme Court, I hereby request your consent to my filing of a brief Amici Curiae on behalf of a considerable group of prominent American citizens none of whom are Communists. The nature of their interest (Rule 2a) is their belief that serious constitutional questions are involved which far transcend those of the Communist Party itself. Some of them are or may be members of organizations which may be affected if the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 is held to be constitutional. If you wish the names and addresses of the persons who wish to act as Friends of the Court, I shall be glad to supply them.

I note the requirements of Rule 2b. I judge that it is not the intent of this rule to prevent the filing of an Amicus brief in a case where all important points of law will, no doubt, be covered by skillful counsel for appellant. The point of view from which the proposed brief approaches the problem, the nature of the interest, the emphasis and frame of reference are different from that of appellant. It will, moreover, raise a fundamental question as to whether "the clear and present danger" which justified the decision of the Supreme Court in United States v. Dennis is what it was when that restriction of First Amendment rights was upheld, or whether in the changed climate of today the Court should re-consider that question with relation to such legislation as the 1950 Act under review. So far as I know this point will not be raised in appellant's brief.

Sincerely yours

ROYAL W. FRANCE

APPENDIX C

OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR GENERAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.

August 25, 1955

Royal W. France, Esq.
104 East 40th Street
New York 16, New York

Re: Communist Party of the United States v. Subversive Activities Control Board, No. 48

Dear Mr. France:

I have your letter of August 18, 1955, in which you request consent to filing of a brief amici curiæ in this case "on behalf of a considerable group of prominent American citizens none of whom are Communists". We have carefully considered your request, and regret that we cannot accede to it.

As you are aware, the Government believes that it must in each instance evaluate a particular request for consent in order to ascertain whether it meets the criteria appropriate for application under Rule 42 of the Revised Rules of the Supreme Court. Accordingly, we are obliged to consider, among other things, "the nature of the * * * interest" (Rule 42, par. 3) of the individual or group requesting consent.

Your request in this case is made "on behalf of a considerable group of prominent American citizens", some of whom "are or may be members of organizations which may be affected if the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 is held to be constitutional." From the description you supply, the group's interest seems too remote, indirect, and contingent to justify consent. There appears to be little more reason for this particular group to file a brief amicus curiae than for any other Americans, either singly or as a group. In the circumstances, we have been unable to conclude that this is an appropriate instance in which Government consent should be given.

This does not imply that the request of an ad hoc group could never warrant consent. We are sure you will understand, however, that unless there is a satisfactory showing of a direct or special interest or concern, the granting of consent would not be compatible with our responsibilities to the Court under its Rule.

This does not, of course, in any way prejudice your right to present a timely motion to the Court for leave to file your proposed brief. I may add that if you should file such a motion, the Government would not oppose it.

For your general information, a copy of a memorandum stating this Office's position on consent to amicus curiae briefs is enclosed.

Sincerely yours,

SIMON E. SOBELOFF
OHP

Simon E. Sobeloff,
Solicitor General.
